"Snowshoe" and Brother Van

Dear Mr. Small:

There comes a time when one should put his house in order, and I thought you might enjoy having the lid from a box of "Snowshoe" brand cigars, which has been in our family since 1899, as it concerns Rev. William Van Orsdel, the well-known and much-loved "Brother Van" in Montana. The picture on the box lid is of the miners and boarding house operators of the old Snowshoe Mine near Libby, Montana, and Brother Van is standing at the extreme left wearing a Derby hat. This picture was taken in 1897 or 1898.

When in Libby Brother Van would walk out to the Snowshoe Mine where he was welcomed by all. My mother, Miss Mary Muffly, was a schoolteacher. She came from Pennsylvania to Virginia City, Montana in 1872. While she was teaching school in 1874 at a place known as Park City, the lovely girl, Jennie Johnson, whom Brother Van would have married had she lived, went to school to my mother. The first decorated Christmas tree presented in a schoolhouse in Montana was by my mother in Park City, and Brother Van was present.

I have been reading all of your publications since discovering them seven years ago, and have all the issues of OLD WEST. I found the rare book, Life Among the Piutes by Sarah Winnemucca Hopkins most interesting. How often I recall hearing my father say that the white man would someday pay, and dearly, for what he had done to the Indian. I have profound admiration for the late Mari Sandoz for her courage in presenting in her fine books the side of the Indian. Perhaps the Indian may yet have the last laugh.—Mrs. Elizabeth C. Franks, W. 2020 Pacific, Spokane, Washington

Wanted—A Home Place

Dear Sirs:

Everybody wants a place in the sun so maybe your readers can help us find ours. We live in a big city and are very unhappy living here. Since we used to be country folks and know what a good life it is, we want to buy our home in the country. Is there a place where it's warm all year around and rains enough so we can have flowers, fruits, and vegetables most of the time? A place where there are woods, streams, and wildlife, a place where people believe good begets good?

We like a small town just big enough for a school, churches, a movie and a few good fishing spots nearby. We have been west only once, but that is all it takes to fall in love with its beauty, and the people are wonderful. They certainly know how to make you feel at home. The West is huge, too huge for us to cover it all, looking for a place to put down roots. We are heading west the summer of '69. We plan to make our first stop Arizona, so we sure could use some leads.

Now last, but certainly not least, may I take this opportunity to tell you that you have our undying gratitude for a chance to learn more about the West and for giving us a world of beauty to escape into when this one sometimes becomes unbearable. Keep up the good work, for

NEW TRACKS IN OLD TRAILS

By FRED HARMAN

MOST FRIENDS of an artist call him a genius or a "born" artist. I was born all right—with a husky pair of lungs and a liking for hair and rawhide. What ability I have comes from a heap of self-learning early stimulated by hand-drawn ads in mail order catalogs whose voluminous pages I would copy through to the saddle and harness section. Sitting in the family privy studying a catalog full of pretty pictures was most stimulating to a budding young artist.

My art was not a so-called born gift, but developed through hard work. With no formal art education, painting has not come easy, and it took many shapes and forms as well as experiences to lead to my present worn and whittled bench before my canvas. Frostbitten fingers clenched tight to reins leading down to a team pulling a bob loaded with hay at 30° below for a herd of hungry cattle didn't keep the hand limber for holding a paintbrush. However, a lifetime of recollections of the good and the bad is a mighty fine model etched on the memory-screen peeking over my easel.

Much has been written about me as the creator of the comic strip, "Red Ryder and Little Beaver." Some of it was true but in some cases my part as the "living" Red Ryder in a rodeo arena was blown higher than a kite to please millions of young hero-worshipping fans. In an effort to set the record straight, I'll go back to and before my weaning time.

My dad and his brother Kos homesteaded in Archuleta County, Colorado, during the 1890s. Their Uncle Bill Sturgill had walked there from Pickering, Missouri, after the Civil War, At that time, Pagosa Springs, an early cavalry post, was called Fort Lewis. Dad and Uncle Kos took up claims a few miles up the San Juan Mountains and the Little Beaver and Fred Harman at a rodeo in Pagosa Springs, Colorado.

Red Ryder and Little Beaver were an unbeatable combination and rode many an inky trail in practically every paper in the country. If you've ever been curious about this rangy cowboy and his little Indian sidekick, here's how they happened to be . . .

Harman and "Little Beaver," Troy Vicenti.

headwaters of the San Juan River and the South Fork of the Rio Grande.

Dad had been a young Missouri farm boy turned lawyer. In 1900 he returned East, met and married Birdie Olive Walker from Ohio. Dad soon tired of city life and in April 1902 the yearning for the homestead found us rattling over Kansas and Nebraska on the old Burlington to Denver, connecting with the Denver and Rio Grande south to the New Mexico border. The D&RG narrow gauge spur line from Pagosa Junction came to a stop amid the usual screeching of brakes and toots to let the local folks know the daily train had arrived with provisions, mail, and an occasional drummer along with a few other souls for one reason or another. Into that sea of snow and slush stepped my dad with his beautiful young wife, who had been painted by the famous Charles Dana Gibson, and a very damp and disgruntled two-month-old me.

The busy frontier town was filled with prospectors, lumberjacks, and adventurers looking for easy pickings. The floor of Jones Grocery was stacked high with cans of salmon, fruit, and other foods to supplement their sparse diet.

This was Indian country—Utes, Navajos, Jicarilla Apaches, along with a few Piutes from over Utah way. The white man was fast settling their favorite hunting grounds. It was with genuine terror that my mother kept me hidden when Apaches, en route to search for the elusive deer and elk, passed near our log cabin windows and peered in. During this colorful period, my two brothers, Hugh and Walker, were born.

MY RECOLLECTIONS from two months to six years is on the hazy side, but the fog sort of clears to find me bouncing back of Dad in the saddle with both hands clawing his suspenders as he yelled, "Hang on, Son!" He'd all but forget me while hazing an ornery milch cow hell bent to a brush hideout to calve. Those words I was to remember all through my life when the going got rough. Even now when a painting is hard and discouraging, I recall, "Hang on, Son!" and start throwing more paint.

School was my biggest chore. I'd rather tag around with the ranch hands. Some kids thought I was "teacher's pet," but after I'd messed up a few books and blackboards with drawings of her, or had dunked Carmelita's black braids, dangling temptingly on my desk, into the inkwell, she soon got fed up with the feistiness and would send me on errands to get me out of the room.

Late one December, the teacher sent me to cut the school Christmas tree. I climbed up old Reservoir Hill in two feet of snow and cut a ten-foot blue spruce. After I'd dragged it over a mile and down the boardwalk of Main Street toward school, a fellow offered me two bits for it. He took the spruce and I hurried home, plumb full of ambition and with twenty-five cents in my pocket. At daybreak, after a worried sleep, I again waded the snow, cut another tree, but this time hauled it up the alley to the schoolhouse. The teacher never learned my business career had started. In fact, I've seldom been out of a job since except for a few lean times trailing a new one.

Fred and his wife Lola. Fred met his comic strip deadlines even with a broken arm!

Long winter nights found me and my two little brothers at the round dining table forever trying to draw pictures. Someone sent a drawing of mine to the St. Joseph, Missouri, News-Press for a Saturday edition contest for young hopefuls. Mine was printed. Six years old and I was on my way.

Kansas City became our home in 1916. Due to my ranch experience, I soon found a job driving a grocery wagon before and after school. The grocery man, old Mr. Hanson, felt lucky to get a kid who could harness and feed his nag.

When World War I came along with Minute Men speakers and exciting drums beating, my patriotism was so aroused I quit school to help whip Kaiser Bill. I was dying to get into the Navy, but they didn't cotton to a fifteen-year-old in their outfit. A week later I joined the Missouri Home Guard which later became the 7th Regiment National Guard. After many months guarding pipes and reservoirs to save Kansas City's precious water from the Germans, I was granted a furlough and hightailed it back to Colorado.

RANGE CATTLE and pack rats had long occupied Dad's log cabin, so with trunk, blanket, and rifle I set up housekeeping under a tall, shady pine tree. I had arrived with just three lone silver dollars, and my pantry was void of everything but flour and a few staples. I had to hunt for meat. Wild game was scarce that season—or scared of a redheaded, hungry kid's .30-30. I'm not ashamed to say that robins and chipmunks tasted pretty good in stew. Rhubarb growing in our deserted garden provided a tasty side dish until about the third day, at which time I was hard to catch. I know darn good and well, rhubarb was the cause of some of the early trails in the San Juan Valley. I was that trail blazer! Mornings, I awakened with the first bird chirp, stirred up the ubiquitous pot of stew, and then started walking, walking, walking to find a job. Ranches were miles apart, and it was two months before this newly employed ranch hand sat down to his first home-cooked meal.

The wage was $30 per month and board. Money was not plentiful with my boss, and he convinced me I should own my own outfit, an unbroken horse, saddle, black angora shotgun chaps and a .30-30 carbine. And to cinch the deal, he threw in two young hogs. Later, when he found I was a glutton for work, he tossed in a Swiss-made gold watch which I stuck proudly in my vest. All this I worked out, and by December it was paid for. Then I lost most of it back to my boss in a poker game! Haven't been too fond of cards since.

Much of the summer was spent in the saddle and doing other ranch work. With roundup and shipping over, I pondered the long winter ahead. Folks in town were wanting coal. Teaming paid eight dollars a day. I borrowed a team and wagon and bobsled. Splitting half with the team owner still left me good wages. In weather below zero at daybreak, I'd build a fire in a tub of sand in the bobsled. But it still was so cold that I would usually end up walking till the sun rose. It was a four-mile climb to the mine; then loaded with two tons, it was back down out of the snow. I would shovel the coal off onto a wagon and head another four miles on mud roads to town. Pretty soon I began to figure there must be a warmer future.

MY FOLKS sent me a new Montgomery Ward suit with pants so long I had to tuck them in my high-topped boots. I was going home for Christmas.

In Kansas City, I found work at the Star as a fly-boy (pressman's helper and clean-up man) at $2.50 per day. The fellows in the press room were a grand bunch, but tough as they come. A new recruit was initiated into the plant by being held down and having his "secrets" freely oiled by the company bully with an oil can. Losing my usual sense of humor, I started a helluva fight which was promptly stopped. Later it was properly resumed with referee and gloves when all the employes could gather down in the basement for the "show."

During the winter, between press runs, I would go up to the art department where for the first time I saw artists drawing for money. The Star had a fine art department. Back then they used no photos or halftones. Everything was hand-drawn with pen and ink. I was mighty impressed and swore that someday I would get that easy money but it would have to wait. I was too interested in cowboying. Spring again found me back on the range.

Harman with his son, then 7 years old, 1933.

Fred Harman dressed up for town at age 15.

No sooner had I shaken off the train soot than I hired out to break up some newly cleared ground. Riding broncos was a cinch compared to riding that team-drawn disc on a hillside of scrub oak roots. I had to strap myself to the iron seat. A few days of that and I was convinced that plowing belonged to farmers and a saddle seat fit me better.

My old boss hired me again. His ranch was small, and a ranch hand did many things other than ride. It was to teach me a whole lot. Getting hurt was part of learning the hard way, but once learned you never forgot. I had to break horses both to saddle and harness, and sometimes busted up plenty of equipment for which I would usually blame the boss in giving me ornery critters to use.

Many ranches were to be my temporary stomping and bed grounds, but all that time the little art-bug in the back of my mind kept kicking around. Once I stretched out a long-legged red gelding I had been breaking and after a few miles I pulled him up to a patch of shade and a water pump on a country school ground. Old Red was lathered up, fighting his head, and I was tired of fighting him. Recollecting something told her, the young schoolmarm called me inside the one-room house. She had heard I could draw a picture and would I draw one on the blackboard for the pupils?

Wearing a tall brown beaver Stetson, spurred boot heels, and black angora chaps, I ambled to the front of the room. My hands were trembling from embarrassment. Not because she was pretty, but because I had to spit and was too ashamed to excuse myself. So I just swallowed the big wad of chewing tobacco crammed in my jaw and sketched "Happy Holligan" on the blackboard, then awkwardly rushed for the water pump. That was my first public art appearance and I sure enough left dusty trail as I flogged that bronc for the ranch and the seclusion of a bunkhouse I shared with a Mexican cowhand.

After a few box socials and all-night country dances, the schoolhouse episode was quite forgotten. I was grown up.

Another winter found me back in Kansas City and this time I was going to find that warm seat at a drawing board. Luck was with me as I soon hired out to the Kansas City Filmad Company at thirty dollars per week! Man, but I had hit the jackpot. I was in the money.

THREE of us were the artists and cartoonists—Ubbe Iwerks, Walt Disney and myself. The others were lettermen and showcard artists. Animated cartoons were made then by jointed figures moved by hand under the camera, therefore each cartoonist was his own cameraman. Illustrations were painted in black and white—only we worked in reverse. For instance, a black shadow would be painted with grey and white shading and a highlight on a man's nose would be a black dot. By doing this the film came out as a positive instead of a negative. It was a great and diversified art experience. The subjects drawn were cartoons or commercial illustrations of everything from beds to britches. And what ads! I remember one laundry ad whose caption read, "Don't kill your wife. Let us do the dirty work"; and a bedding company ad read, "Our salesman stands beside every bed we sell!"

After a year, Walt and I were good enough to command $40.00 per week. Our sights, however, were set for long-range money and fame. We secretly rented a studio, bought a used Universal movie camera and tripod and a second-hand Model T Ford coupe. When the first American Legion Convention was held in Kansas City, Walt and I were commissioned by Pathe News to film that great event from the air. They were to pay us one dollar per foot and the raw film cost but five cents. We could clean up. Sunday we were to go up over Nickells Field in two "Flying Jennies," Walt in one, and I in another. Neither of us had flown before. The night before we had crawled through the basement window and "borrowed" one of the boss' cameras. Now as we stood waiting on the field, dressed with puttees and bill caps turned backwards, one of the pilots yelled for me to hop in and we would look things over before taking up the cameras.

I never had been any higher than a tall pine tree scouting for turkeys, and when I was back on the ground I convinced Walt that the assignment was just too risky. It was downright dangerous. If one of the planes fell, we might bust the boss' camera! Agreeing, we both hopped in the same cockpit with only our own camera, leaving the boss' camera safe on the ground. We took several hundred feet of film which later turned out to be under-exposed. Our hopes for fast riches were wiped out. However, the boss' camera was safely back in his plant come Monday morning with no one the wiser.

Walt and I quit our jobs at the Filmad Company—probably the only time he ever went broke. We had been working very hard, traveling all around the neighboring towns in Missouri and Kansas signing up movie theaters for filmads we hoped to make, but we just couldn't swing it. Our rent was due and finally the Ford was repossessed. Walt scared up train fare and headed for Hollywood with the camera. There he raised a little money and with his brother Roy developed what everyone knows now as the great Disney Enterprises. My brother Hugh had taken my old Filmad job and later joined Disney in California which led to his becoming associated with Rudolph Ising in Harman-Ising and creating the famous animated cartoons, "Merry Melodies" and "Happy Harmonies." My brother Walker joined them.

We three now were artists. But after a whirl at commercial art with printers and engravers in Kansas City, I was discouraged and the call of the open range found me once more in a Colorado saddle. Mother had died and Dad was in St. Louis. My only strings now were on the saddle holding my few possessions. Ranch jobs had become easier to find and, as a whole, more interesting. My experiences were later to be invaluable to me as a western painter.

DURING the fall of '24, with snow on the peaks and a nip in the air, my feet got restless. One frosty morning after getting the hump out of my bronc's back, I headed for town. Seldom did I get much mail, but what I got that day was to change my whole future.

I would stuff the mail in my shirt and as my pony jogged up the river road, I would pull out and read one piece at a time. This day a yellow envelope held a telegram. It was from my old artist friend, Sam McConnell, who had gone to St. Joe. He wired that I could have an illustrating job at the Artcrafts Engraving Company.

I had ridden only about four miles when this news hit me like a mule's kick. Wheeling my horse off the road, I forded the river, picked up old Bill Flaugh, a cowboy friend, and we tore out for the ranch where I had been batching. All my belongings were in a gunnysack we held between us as our horses loped to town. Luck found me a free all-night automobile ride to Denver. From the outskirts I took a streetcar to the railway station and caught the Burlington for St. Joe.

My Aunt Lillian answered my knock at her front door. She hardly recognized this rangy, unshaven cowboy in rough ranch clothes and worn boots. Not having had time to change into my city suit (which was now wrinkled and

In response to all those who have been wanting to read more about the Northwest logging days, we are mighty glad to tell you that such will be coming your way. No man knew this particular phase of the West any better than Dad Ingles, and he starts in this issue—a fourteen-year-old living with a neighbor in a wilderness country where you mostly "raised your own help" or did without . . .

EVERYBODY AGREED that Mr. and Mrs. Washburn stood out as the cooingest doves in all Washington County, Oregon. Those days in the eighties there was mighty little time for lovey-dovey stuff and new dresses and compliments.

Before they was married the young people made the time for dances and courtships and buggy rides and sleigh rides even though they had to get along without much sleep after they got home. But married couples didn't have time for such nonsense. They was always busy, with the old man up and away before dawn and not back until after dark, and too tired to do much except go to bed. Except on dance nights—then they really cut capers, but on these nights mostly the men flirted with other wives, and the wives flirted with other husbands. Nothing to it, just harmless fun, pulling jokes on each other and drinking apple cider. The women always drank the fresh cider and the men the hard cider.

But the Washburns was different. I seen that almost as soon as I come to work for them. The first year I was to get my room and board and clothes and that was all, the second year the same plus twenty-five dollars, if I stayed on. I was twelve years old.

By modern standards my childhood hadn't been easy, but how was I to know that? My father was a blacksmith, kilt when I was ten, so like all widow women in them times, my mother 'prenticed out her oldest kids. Oldest sister went to work in a hotel in Forest Grove. Two older brothers was 'prenticed to farmers at twenty dollars a year and keep. Mother took me and the three youngest, all girls, and stayed on there at Greenville as a housekeeper in the home of a sour old widower, name of Martin Manning, who was good in his heart and a religious man.

I stayed with Mother till I put on some age and weight. Worked part-time for a carpenter named Meade and begun to learn to handle tools at the age of ten. Quit school, not quite finishing the fourth reader. I liked tools right off from the beginning. So next I was sent to Mr. and Mrs. Washburn to be the choreboy around the place.

THE WASHBURNS seemed afraid of something and yet happy at the same time. He'd come in from the field where he was blasting out stumps and burning down trees, clearing off a new pasture, and he'd catch hold of Mrs. Washburn and ask her if she was all right, and then they'd kiss and waste some time, and he'd go back to work. Four or five times a day he'd come in to see how she was, and she'd hang onto him as though she could never let him go, and they'd sort of whisper and kiss, and I never did rightly catch what they was whispering about. They didn't have any kids, and they sure needed an extra hand around that place, what with all they was trying to do, clear land and run a dairy, and Ted Washburn taking odd jobs once in a while for extra money.

There was some mystery, too, about them coming to Washington County. The gossip got started that Ginny Washburn was some kind of lady in society somewhere, and when her folks wouldn't let her marry this Ted Washburn, they'd run away and been married and come as strangers without any money to Washington County and homesteaded, and never once wrote home or let her folks know where she was. Ginny Washburn was small and too skinny for the kind of work that farm women had to do. Most of the farm women thereabouts was heavy and strong and didn't mind swinging an ax once in a while, if it become necessary. Ginny was too frail, with a big bunch of black hair, coal black, on top of her head to make her look taller, and the biggest black eyes I ever seen, and very pretty.

Everybody helped out everybody else in the early days. They had to. Especially when a new homesteader moved in and started from scratch to clear land and build hisself a farm. And I think the folks helped out the Washburns almost more than any other young couple on account of the story about her having been rich or something, on account of her being frail and weak looking and Ted not so strong looking hisself because he worked too hard for his strength, but mostly on account of them being such love birds, which women kind of take to. Even though they don't have it theirselves, they kind of like others to have it, and they like to help it along.

That's how Washington County got settled up. It was a funny thing to watch, so funny you could laugh about it. Young couple move in there and file on 640 acres of forest land. Man would get out there by hisself and clear a small patch of maybe an acre or two and build hisself a log cabin—or later on with the mill, a board cabin—always one room, kitchen, parlor, bedroom combined, with an old iron stove for cooking and for hot water and to keep the place warm.

About nine, ten months, a year later, this young homesteader would go to laying out the foundation for a second room, and everybody knew what was happening before it happened, and there'd be a log rolling bee that would clear off eight or ten more acres for planting or grazing. Pretty soon, nine, ten months, a year later, settler would start foundation for a third room. And everybody, knowing what was happening, would plan on another log rolling bee and clear off another ten, twelve acres for planting and pasture. About that time the couple would be able to afford a yoke of oxen, or maybe only one ox, and put a cow to team with the ox for plowing and harrowing and harvesting, and for dragging the stumps off after they was rooted or blasted out.

Some of them houses expanded through the years, till they was eight, nine, ten rooms big, and a worse clutter you never saw.

FOLKS COOPERATED in other ways too. Hog butchering, for instance. Every farmer would raise one litter of hogs for the year's pork. Generally the butchering would take place in the winter time when the weather turned cold, and there wasn't much else to do except the chores, and the hogs was eating dry feed. A farmer usually had six, eight, ten nearly full-growed hogs from his sow's litter. He'd send out notice to four or five neighbors and they'd all come flocking down on the day set and go to work.

Every man kept pretty busy, what with sticking hogs in the throat, bleeding them, getting them into boiling water and scraping off the bristles, keeping them moving so the hair wouldn't stick. Each of them hogs weighed two, three hundred pounds apiece and it took a couple of good men to handle each one. After they'd been gutted and hung up, each man would take home a heart or piece of liver for his breakfast, with the understanding he was to come back in two days to help finish the job, which was cutting them up for the smokehouse or for putting them down in brine. After that second job each would take home a large-sized piece of fresh pork. Then later on it was turnabout with one of the other farmers having his hogs butchered.

Barns was put up in the same way, for it took two-three dozen men to raise a barn. The farmer would cut and trim a bunch of poles or beams for his supports and his roof, and his floor joists and upper joists and rafters. He'd hire a young feller by the name of Snyder to hew out the sills with a broad ax, which is just like a hand-ax with a foot- or sixteen-inch blade on it instead of a smaller blade and with an offset to protect the knuckles in trimming down a log. After everything was ready, the farmer would send out word to twenty or thirty of his neighbors that there was to be a barn raising bee. They'd all come in their buggies and wagons and sleds, bringing their families, and the kids would play while the men worked, just like they did at a log rolling bee, and after the barn was raised and the framework finished, there'd be eats of all kinds for everybody and maybe some dancing later. With the frame up, the farmer finished his own barn hisself, putting on the siding and the roof boards and the shingles.

Almost two years after I started to work for the Washburns, Mr. Washburn set me to work digging near the house, and he begun to haul rock on a sled with his yoke of oxen. I kind of figured out what that meant, but he didn't look or act like a man who was going to be a father. He looked worried all the time, with a pucker between his eyes, and he didn't even cheer up when Jed Parker came by and told him the neighbors planned another log rolling for him and was his eight acres north of the cabin ready, and he said "yes" but it didn't seem to cheer him up any.

It made the time gallop for me, because it was my first log rolling bee, of which I've attended plenty since, and seemed better than the Fourth of July or Christmas coming along. I didn't even mind too much how the extra work got piled on me, because Mr. Washburn was hurrying the burning down of his trees for the occasion, and I had to help him do that as well as keep up with my regular chores.

THE FARMERS didn't chop down their trees the way the regular log fallers did later on in the timber. You drilled a hole slantwise into the trunk with a brace and long bit until you about hit center. You put a stick in this hole so you'd know the direction and depth, and below this slantwise hole you'd drill a straight hole till they met. You had to have the two holes for ventilation. Then you put hot coals into the hole and kept them burning with a hand bellows, till a fire was burning inside the tree, and you kept this fire going until you knowed the tree was coming down, and then you made fast tracks out of the way because with this kind of falling you never could be dead certain which direction the tree would take.

After it was down, you trimmed it, and was ready for the second burning. You burned the logs, not too long so they could be rolled into piles, in exactly the same way as you falled the tree, only when you got to the narrow end, you chopped it through.

We got that section all ready for the log rolling, and everybody come from miles around in their wagons and buggies and two-seaters, or maybe they come on horseback riding double—women and children as well as men.

It was quite a gathering. Right off, the men pitched in with their peaveys and crowbars and begun to roll the logs into big piles, and the women hustled about helping Mrs. Washburn or getting out their baskets of food and setting up tables and other places to eat. And there was plenty to eat around there—chicken and turkey and some venison and even bear meat that a farmer had shot; homemade bread and apple pies and fifty-gallon barrels of cider hauled in the wagons, and smoked Columbia River salmon.

The kids played around one way or another, the smaller kids fighting or teasing the girls or playing games, the older kids playing the way older kids play. I was up to the latter category now.

I'd just begun to take a interest in girls, and naturally by example and inclination, the proper approach to a girl seemed to be make their acquaintance and then give them a hug or a kiss as soon afterward as possible. I wasn't the bashful type as some were, having so many sisters around all the time, but it was some little while before I got down to brass tacks with a particular young lady. To me girls was curious animals, all ruffled in their dresses, which hung down to their shoe points. You could only catch a glimpse of their button shoes once in a while, and of their ankles only when they was swinging in a yard swing or getting on and off a horse. It was a rare sight, a lady's ankle. Them girls flittered around together like a bunch of frisky, man-shy colts, giggling like all get out, and sometimes whispering and pointing, so if you was at all bashful you felt like something the cat dragged in. I wasn't bashful, so I just figured they wasn't talking about me.

Oregon girls was pink-cheeked and healthy looking from living on farms and working hard, and not having a chance to stay out late at night too often. They didn't need no face paint to color them up.

I was held back a little on account of my age which, though I looked old for my years, some of them young ladies regarded as considerable shy of the required mark. And there was so many of them I hardly knowed how to go about picking just one. Seemed like such a shame to leave all the others out.

WELL, I and the other older boys pitched in and helped with the work, though we didn't try to do as much as the men, of course. Early in the afternoon the log rolling was pretty well finished, all hands with their peaveys and crowbars and axes trimming them off and rolling them into piles to be set fire to later by me and Mr. Washburn.

Wasn't much else you could do with all that good lumber in that day and time because the mills was too far away to make it a profitable haul, and you couldn't burn near that much in your fireplace and cookstove of a winter. I knowed one feller, old man Bean, who couldn't stand to see all that wood going to waste, so when he come around to building a new house on his place, he put a fireplace in every corner of every room. That house had sixteen fireplaces in it, and he kept them all going all winter long, but even then he couldn't burn up the wood fast enough from clearing off his land, and finally give up trying to keep all them going at once.

When the logs was pretty well piled up, the men pitched in and helped to build the framework of Mr. Washburn's new room as long as the sun was up. We boys and girls drifted off, and it wasn't long before I'd got pretty chummy with a gal by the name of Lydz Anderson. She was cross between blond and brown hair, sort of the color of corn shocks after they've weathered a bit, very curly hair. I think it was the curly hair that caught my fancy. And the blue eyes.

I got her off into the willows near the crick and I made her go wading with me, and I found out her name and where she lived and all, and that she didn't like school none.

"What's your chiefest ambition then?" I asked her.

"I aim to marry a millionaire," she said, and she acted serious about it.

I laughed at her. "Where'd you find any old millionaire around here?"

"I'll find him. Don't you worry," she says. "Either that or I intend to go on the stage. What's your ambition?"

I thought awhile. I'd never had much real ambition, but one thing I'd always aimed for. "Almost anything'd suit me," I tells her. "Just so I make enough money to live and have fun. But most I'd like to be a logger in the high timber."

It didn't matter that the pay was low and the risks great. Most big timber men didn't live long lives. But ever' kid in ever' town and village had his mind set to become a logger. One time or another ever' kid had seen them striding along somewhere, usually in groups, big and boisterous men, calked boots, shagged trousers, full beards, stocking caps, tough as nails and hardwood.

"Some ambition!" Lydz hooted at me. When she stuck out her tongue she looked cute as a trick.

I didn't see no use to pursue that conversation further, so I says to her, "I want to kiss you and I'm going to."

"No, you're not," she yells and runs off, me chasing her.

She was not hard to catch; I grabbed her halfway into the stream where she'd splashed. "I'll duck you if you don't let me."

Reno Ingles with his two older sisters, about 1900.

She squirmed around trying to cut loose. "Reno Ingles, I've never been kissed, and you're not going to kiss me! I'll slap your face! I'll kick! I'll—I'll kill you!"

That made me laugh. "How old are you?"

"Fifteen."

"I'm sixteen," I lied. "It's about time—you fifteen—you got kissed. You don't want to die a old maid."

So then I kissed her. Not much of a kiss, I reckon, by later standards of mine. She was the first girl I'd ever kissed, Lydz was. She squirmed around some at first, but then stood quiet and let me kiss her. She didn't slap my face or nothing. Just stood there looking at the ground.

"You want to know something?" I says. "I aim to marry you when I'm old enough, millionaire or not."

She throwed her head back and laughed and run away to join the others out in the clearing.

Speaking of the subject, I've kissed so many women I lost count long ago. In fact, I started a principle right then which I have kept up ever since, even to the present day, which is to kiss a lady any time you got the chance, married or single. You can tell right off if they've got the inclination, and there's no harm to it.

Anyhow it got to be night-time, and some of the log-rollers drove off home and some stayed on to dance to the fiddle. This was the first time I danced and I seemed to catch on right quick to the steps, probably because I wasn't bashful. If a girl turned me down, I went on to the next till I found one who was willing to have a go with me. I didn't get but one dance with Lydz because the other fellers kept her too busy.

After they was all gone home, maybe two o'clock in the morning, Mr. and Mrs. Washburn did all the cleaning up of the mess. Mr. Washburn looked tired, but Mrs. Washburn looked worse than that; she looked dust-gray almost.

"You go to bed," Mr. Washburn told me.

"I'll stay up and lend a hand," I said. "That's about the best party I ever seen. Better than the Fourth of July and Christmas together." He grinned but the grin soured on him.

He took Mrs. Washburn in his arms. "Oh, honey, you have to go to bed."

"No."

"You have to."

I knowed something was running along underneath the surface with them, but I couldn't figure out what. It wasn't my business anyhow.

After things had been picked up and I was in bed, I overheard her crying and I heard him say, "Oh, dear Jesus, why did this have to happen to us?"

GINNY WASHBURN just wasn't born strong enough for the kind of work to be done on a farm in Oregon in the eighties. Since then I've realized we lived pretty primitive, probably pretty much like the earliest settlers, clearing land and getting along on what we could make or grow—every farmer somewhat of a carpenter and blacksmith and lumberjack and farmer combined. And you might add meat packer because we had all sorts of ways for handling meat that I will mention later. I would say that Oregon in them days was sort of the last frontier, more so than California or Arizona or Texas.

Anyhow, Ginny Washburn wasn't strong and wasn't brought up for that kind of life. Sometimes she'd get so tired she had to set down a spell, and she'd try to knit socks while she was resting but she was most too tired to knit.

One day along about the time I'd been with the Washburns a year, I come in from the pump with a couple of buckets of water for her, and there she was in the middle of the kitchen floor, passed out stone cold. I set down those buckets and bent over her, and felt her face and it was kind of cold and clammy and I thought she was dead.

I didn't know what to do. Mr. Washburn was clean over on the other side of the farm plowing and there wasn't a doctor nearer'n Forest Grove, eight-ten miles away. I sort of rubbed her face and hands and then I got a rag and dipped it in one of the buckets of water and mopped her face. Next I remembered she had some smelling salts in her bedroom, so I cheesed it to the bedroom for that blue bottle of smelling salts, and I held them up to her nose and she jumped like she'd been bit by a rattlesnake and come out of it fast.

I could of almost cried that she wasn't dead but only passed out.

"I must of fainted, Reno," she said.

"Guess so."

She noticed the smelling salts. "You're a smart boy, Reno. That was what I needed. It's happened before."

I helped her into the parlor and got her comfortable on the settee and brought her a blanket when she said she was cold. She patted my hand and thanked me very pretty.

It was late afternoon and the sun was just sneaking into that parlor, which was a big room with hand-cut beams, and out of the window you could see the long level cleared land and the thick pine forest on the ridge, undergrown with ferns and vines taller than a man, and still wet and silver from the morning rain.

She got all right after a while and says to me, "You must promise me something, Reno. You must promise me, cross your heart and hope to die, that you won't say a word about this to Mr. Washburn. He'd just worry hisself sick and want to stay near the house all the time."

"But maybe he ought to know, Mrs. Washburn. Maybe you ought to go to the doc in Forest Grove."

She touched my hand and her fingers was still cold like slivers of ice. "It wouldn't do any good." She was sniffing a little and dabbing her nose with a handkerchief. "I know I'm going to die before long. I just want Ted to get a good start, and then maybe he'll marry a strong girl and can have some children. Ted is so good looking and honest he ought to have some children."

"You won't die," I said.

"We can't have any children, Reno," she said.

I told her that sure she could.

"Anyway, you promise not to say anything to Ted."

"Sure I promise. I'd do most anything for you, Mrs. Washburn."

IT WAS quite a responsibility for me; I rustled around, helping her all I could. I even learned to cook some, a chore that has served me in good stead on more occasions than I can remember.

I kept thinking about that day as I went about my work the morning after the log rolling bee. My chores on the Washburn place was considerable, too much, really, when I first come there at the age of twelve. I used to get so tired at night that I couldn't sleep and would just lay awake staring at the blackness where the ceiling was. And I used to dream quite a bit, mostly about Pa and Ma and the Washburns. One night I dreamed that I'd died and gone to heaven and I hurt all over when I got to heaven because I'd been running all the way. And this angel laid her hand on my head, and rubbed my head a little, and said, "Don't be so restless, Reno. I know how you feel. You mustn't think about it, because you're in heaven now." And this angel looked just like Mrs. Washburn, with that pile of black hair on top of her head and her big shiny black eyes.

Next morning I picked up Mrs. Washburn's slipper from beside my bed and took it down to her and handed it to her. "Oh, yes," she said. "I must have dropped it in your room when I was making your bed." I still don't know how much of that was dream and how much wasn't.

Most of my job was milking the eleven cows, selling the cream, and making and selling the butter. We didn't have any fancy separators and fancy churns, just about everything was done by hand. We didn't even have a windmill. All the water was pumped by hand from the well out back, and the overflow went into a trough where the cattle sometimes watered and where I cooled and separated the cream.

Every morning all of us was up at five, summer and winter, sunshine or dark, cold or warm. That was the time we all got up, me and Mr. Washburn starting the chores and Mrs. Washburn lighting the stove and beginning breakfast, which was always a heavy meal with different kinds of meat or eggs or sometimes fish and potatoes and lots of times hot cakes or bacon, with homemade bread and skim milk. We ate breakfast about six. Then I went out and milked the cows that I'd sent Cleopatra after.

Cleo was the Washburns' shepherd dog and smart as they come, if not smarter. You could say to her, "Go fetch Nigger," and away she'd trot into the woods, and by and by in would come the only horse the Washburns owned, a black gelding, with Cleo trotting behind and nipping at her heels if she tried to keep from running into the corral. Or you'd say, "Go fetch the oxen," and it would be the same with the one yoke that the Washburns owned and used mostly for farmwork. Nigger was a saddle horse. Or I'd tell her, "Bring in the cows, Cleo," and off she went to do the job. But she'd do better than that. If the cows got into the wrong stalls in the milk house, she'd fuss around them, barking and yipping until she had them in the proper arrangement, changing one from one stall and another from another. She was almost as good as a extra hand.

AFTER BREAKFAST I went out and milked all the cows. We had a one-legged milking stool that fastened around your waist with a strap so you didn't have to keep moving and shifting it. After my fingers got strong enough, I could finish those eleven cows in under an hour, even to squirting the big tomcat full as he followed me around. He knew the right time and would wait patient, then open his mouth and I'd give him a squirt or two from each cow. Got so I could hit his mouth four to five feet away.

To cool the milk I had a big metal container with glass at each end, which I'd put in the big wooden overflow trough by the pump. Cream come to the top, skim milk settled to the bottom where there was a spigot. I'd run the milk off into cans and then pour the cream from the top into buckets. We fed the skim milk to the pigs and calves and sometimes to chickens we was fattening for the table, and we drank the skim milk too. Cream we either sold direct to the creamery or I made it into butter.

We stored the buckets of cream in the earth cellar on the wooden shelves, where they stayed cool until the dairy wagon picked them up or ripened till the cream was ready for churning, and I'd churn right there in the cellar.

I poured it into a hand churn and cranked until the butter formed in yellow globs, and drank a cupful of the buttermilk right out of the churn the way I liked it best. No comparison to store-bought buttermilk. After I'd poured off the buttermilk, I begun to work the butter, salting and working it, using a large wooden bowl and wooden paddles and plenty of salt. After I'd got the liquid worked out good, I shaped it up into circular two-pound hunks, putting a little fancy decoration on the top with the edge of the paddle.

The feller who collected the cream come about every two days in his wagon and gave a loud "halloo" out front. I'd pour enough out of the buckets of fresh cream for coffee, carry the rest out to him and hand up the buckets. This wagon carried big tin containers. He'd open one of them, stick in his yard stick and take measure. Then he'd pour in whatever cream I give him and measure again. We was paid by the inch, ten cents an inch.

It was my job to take in what little money the farm made and give it to Mrs. Washburn. Like from the cream. And every two, three days I made the trip in to Greenville on foot to sell what-

Clay Allison

Clay Allison was fastidious about how he killed and whom he killed—a little surprising considering his low opinon of his contemporaries!

The WEST'S Most ECCENTRIC GUNMAN

CLAY ALLISON—Clay Allison of the Washita, as he later was called—was born in Tennessee in 1840. He was a flaming Secessionist and fought through a good part of the Civil War under the beleaguered General Nathan Bedford Forrest. Some of the time he was a scout. He won the reputation of being deadly accurate with the Bowie knife, both by throwing and wielding it.

Not long after the Civil War ended, Clay Allison came west; he helped drive a herd of cattle from the Brazos to New Orleans. In 1866 he was in New Mexico. Before long he was ranching on his own hook. He trailed his own cattle into Colorado and Kansas. He remained an unreconstructed Rebel and made a reputation for accurate six-shooter shooting and for not tolerating Yankee soldiers, either white or colored.

With him everything was personal, especially when he had enough drinks to arouse his imagination. He never shot for gain, killed for glory, or hired his gunmanship to another, but his principles were sometimes fantastic and prejudiced. The nearest fire-eater to him that I can summon up is Benvolio in "Romeo and Juliet." "Why," says Mercutio to Benvolio, "thou wilt quarrel with a man for cracking nuts, having no other reasons but because thou hast hazel (nut) eyes. . . . Thou has quarreled with a man for coughing in the street because he hath wakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun."

One of Allison's most quixotic expeditions was to Dodge City, Kansas, in the 1870s to call the hand of Wyatt Earp who was city marshal and who, like Wild Bill Hickok, was positively disliked by most ex-Confederate trail drivers. Stuart N. Lake in his biography of Earp has Clay Allison and other Southerners backing down and out of town like so many scalded dogs. Clay Allison had more sense than to charge a battery of rifles and shotguns with nothing but a six-shooter, but his bravery has never been questioned.

When he went into town to celebrate, he rode a snow white or coal black horse. It has been said that he would not tie his black horse up but would leave him loose to pick grass about town. When he wanted the horse, he would give a high whistle through two fingers and the black would come racing to him.

At a certain stage of his celebrating mood, Allison would strip as naked as Lady Godiva, except for a cartridge belt that helped a red ribbon serve as breech cloth, and thus ride up and down the dirt streets of Cimarron, New Mexico, or Mobeetie, Texas, giving the Rebel yell and emptying his six-shooters into the air. He never had any success in persuading his horse to drink either beer or whiskey and water while he was refreshing himself between such rides.

He liked to keep a fiddler in his cow camp. While he was foreman of a grand jury, he arranged that all of the jurors be given all the whiskey they could drink—at the expense of the county. He was opposed to organizations by livestock men because, in his judgment, they intruded on private rights.

HE TOLD a reporter of the Las Vegas, New Mexico, Optic that he wished a portrait of his shepherd dog "which does not talk much but thinks a great deal" to appear along with pictures of cowmen in a publication supported by the Lincoln County Stock Association. A cowman himself, he took the part of farmer squatters against the strong-armed, organized ranchers. He could be depended on to support the underdog—and to accommodate any badman from Bitter Creek who wanted to gain fame by killing him. He seems to have killed several men, all of them incumbrances to the good earth.

Some sixty years ago, many stories about Clay Allison were in circulation around Pecos and other points in West Texas and New Mexico. One of these yarns related to a duel between Clay and another cowman over a waterhole. In Clay Allison's day, water wells were nonexistent in vast areas of West Texas and New Mexico. Grazing land without a dependable supply of water was useless.

Clay Allison and his neighboring rancher agreed on a plan to settle the controversy. In accordance with their agreement they met at the waterhole, each armed with a Bowie knife, a pick and a shovel. Working together, they dug a grave. When the grave was finished they got in it, clasped left hands, and at the count of three drew their

Black Kettle, chief of the Southern Cheyennes, was among the more than 100 Indians killed in the Battle of the Washita in which General George Custer led the Seventh Cavalry in a dawn attack November 27, 1868, taking the camp by surprise. The night before the attack, Black Kettle had returned from a peace council at Fort Cobb. He was the first to fall the next day.

Prelude

FEW MEN are given a choice in their final destiny but on November 27, 1868, George A. Custer probably determined the manner of his death.

Black Kettle, respected leader of the Southern Cheyennes and a strong influence on other tribes including the Arapaho, Kiowa and Comanche, had for years sought a path of peace for his people. Kit Carson and William Bent knew and trusted him, as did General Harney.

"Our white brothers are pulling away from us the hand they gave us at Medicine Lodge but we will try to hold on to it. We hope that the Great White Father will take pity on us and let us have the guns and ammunitions that he promised us so we can go hunt buffalo to keep our families from starving."—Black Kettle, Peace Chief of the Cheyennes, to Col. E. W. Wynkoop, Indian agent at Fort Larned, July, 1868.

"I never knew an Indian chief to break his word. I have lived on this frontier fifty years and I have never yet known an instance in which war broke out with these tribes that the tribes were not in the right."—Gen. W. S. Harney, senior officer representing the government at Medicine Lodge Treaty council, October, 1867.

"The day that we reached here we crossed a fresh trail of a large war party going north. Had the Kansas volunteers been here, as we expected, my orders would have allowed me to follow the back trail of the war party right to their village and we would have found the latter in an unprotected state."—George A. Custer, letter to his wife from Camp Supply, November, 1867.

On November 26, 1868, Black Kettle returned to his village on the Washita after a visit with Gen. W. B. Hazen, Indian agent at Fort Cobb. Hazen had advised Black Kettle to move his people closer to Fort Cobb so they would not become involved in the campaign being mounted by Custer and Gen. Philip H. Sheridan.

Custer attacked the "unprotected" village, which had seemed to be his preference, on November 27, 1868, and the first victim of his attack was Black Kettle.

Thus, the story of the Battle of the Washita must be the story of events beginning with a peace council seven years earlier and ending with the death of Custer on the Little Big Horn, seven years later.

While the attention of most Americans was concentrated on the elections of 1860 and other events which would lead to a war between North and South, efforts to prevent a different kind of war were being made at Bent's Fort on the Arkansas River in southeastern Colorado.

Among the Indian leaders called in by the government to talk peace were Black Kettle, chief of the Cheyennes, and Little Black Kettle had earned his position of leadership during the Cheyennes' long warfare with the Pawnees. At the peace council, Black Kettle fought with equal determination.

The government wanted the Indians to give up some of their finest lands in return for a promise of peace. Black Kettle refused to sign the treaty he felt was unfair. If the people were to lose their lands, he said, the matter should be determined by all the tribe, not by just a few leaders. He emerged from the council at Bent's Fort as the peace spokesman of the Indians.

In the spring and summer of 1864 there was a crucial need for peace spokesmen. William Bent, who had become the trusted friend of the Cheyennes after opening trade with the Indians in eastern Colorado, was traveling along the Arkansas River near Fort Larned when he met a detachment of dragoons under Lt. George Eayre.

The young officer told Bent he had just killed seventeen Indians in a fight with the Cheyennes on Ash Creek, and said he had orders to kill Cheyennes who were accused of stealing cattle belonging to a government contractor.

As the dragoons rode on to Fort Larned, Bent heard the Indian version of the battle. The Indians told Bent how a delegation had gone out to meet the dragoons. Leading the procession was Lean Bear, who in 1862 had been one of the chiefs who went to Washington as allies of the Great White Father. His gesture of peace was shattered by a hail of bullets.

The more than 500 warriors in the village answered the attack; Eayre's cannon cut down many but the 54 dragoons were badly outnumbered. As the troops fell back, Black Kettle rode among the Cheyennes, ordering them to stop fighting. He had no idea why the dragoons attacked, but he knew that killing them would only bring more attacks. He sought the aid of William Bent.

At Fort Lyon Bent told Col. J. M. Chivington, commander of the Colorado Volunteers, of the events at Ash Creek. Bent said he felt the Cheyennes could be convinced to remain at peace.

Chivington replied that regardless of Indian intentions, he had no authority to talk peace with the Indians. Bent later told a congressional investigating committee that he reminded Chivington if there were war with the Indians, the settlers would be placed in danger. The former Methodist elder replied that the settlers would have to take care of their own protection.

DISHEARTENED BY Chivington's comments, Bent rode back to his fort. Soon he received word that Gov. John Evans of Colorado Territory had issued a proclamation calling for the Indians to move to villages near Fort Larned and Fort Lyon. There, Evans said, they would be fed by the government and could avoid danger of conflict with troops hunting for hostiles.

Among the bands which went to Fort Larned in August to consider Evans' offer were the Kiowas led by Satanta and Left Hand's Arapahoes. When a sentry raised a rifle against Satanta, the fiery Kiowa put an arrow through the man's arm.

A council was called to keep the incident from worsening, but young Kiowas ran off the fort's herd of horses while the chiefs were talking peace. Left Hand and other Arapaho leaders went to the fort under a white flag to offer their help in recovering the horses. Nervous soldiers, fearing another trick, fired a cannon at the group.

No one was injured by the shot, but the Arapahoes were convinced the peace offer was false. The Indians headed for the Solomon River. From there the southern tribes joined the northern tribes in raids against wagontrains and settlers. An estimated 200 whites were killed.

Still hoping for peace talks, Bent sent a letter to Black Kettle and the other Cheyenne chiefs, asking them to make peace. On August 29, 1864, the Indians sent a message to Maj. E. W. Wynkoop, commanding officer at Fort Lyon, and S. E. Colley, Indian agent at the fort:

"We received a letter from Bent wishing us to make peace. We held Council in regard to it. All come to the conclusion to make peace with you, providing that you make peace with the Kiowas, Comanches, Arapahoes, Apaches and Sioux. We are going to send a messenger to the Kiowas and to the other nations about our going to make peace with you."

The letter also contained an offer to trade white prisoners held by the Indians for some Indians being held in Denver. It was signed by Black Kettle.

Wynkoop went to the Cheyenne camp at Smoky Hill to receive the prisoners and to arrange a council in Denver. A delegation of Indians returned to Denver with Wynkoop and a council was held with Evans, Chivington and other officials.

The Indians left feeling that the trouble which had started at Fort Larned was over. Several Arapaho bands, including Left Hand's group and numbering about 650, moved into Big Timbers where they were to be watched over by Maj. Scott J. Anthony, who had succeeded Wynkoop at Fort Lyon.

Cheyenne bands moved to Sand Creek, about forty miles from Fort Lyon. Black Kettle and a delegation reported to Anthony, who told them he had not received instructions concerning them. He said they should return to their villages and wait. Anthony then sent a report to Chivington, giving the location of the village.

FROM his camp on Bijou Creek Chivington began a march to Fort Lyon through heavy snow. Leaving the fort on the evening of November 28, 1864, with Bent's son, Robert, ordered into service as scout, Chivington arrived at the village at dawn. The force of more than 700 men was stationed in a line along a bluff overlooking the village.

Early-rising squaws sounded the alarm. Black Kettle raised the American flag and a white flag. The estimated 500 squaws and 200 men in the village were in panic. The battle was short and furious. In the afternoon Chivington wrote in his report:

"Attacked a Cheyenne village . . . from nine hundred to a thousand warriors . . . We killed Chiefs Black Kettle, White Antelope and Little Robe and between four and five hundred other Indians."

He listed his own losses as nine killed and thirty-eight wounded. Chivington returned to a hero's welcome in Denver. The glory soon soured, however, as other information came to light. Black Kettle and Little Robe had not been killed although the casualties included such leaders and chiefs as White Antelope, Yellow Wolf, One-Eye and the Arapaho Left Hand, who had moved his band from Big Timbers.

Statements from Indians and from George Bent, one of two Bent sons visiting in the village at the time Robert was forced to guide Chivington, gave Indian casualties as 110 women and children and 53 men killed.

In his report of the battle, Robert Bent said: "I saw five squaws under a bank . . . the soldiers shot them all. . . . I saw one squaw, lying on a bank, whose leg had been broken by a shell. A soldier came up to her with drawn sabre. She raised her arm to protect herself when he struck, breaking her arm; she rolled over and raised her other arm when he struck, breaking it; then he left without killing her. . . . I saw quite a number of infants in arms killed with their mothers."

Even more damaging testimony was given by officers and men in Chivington's force and is included in the record, "Condition of Indian Tribes, 1867."

News of the attack spread among the Indian villages and each band sought revenge. Towns, settlements and travelers in Colorado, Kansas and Nebraska were terrorized. Stage stations were burned, women and children kidnaped. It was the settlers, as Bent had warned, who suffered for the army's actions.

Congress voted to investigate the massacre and general conditions of the Indians. Congressmen Doolittle, Ross and Foster took testimony at Fort Lyon in August, 1865. Among those called to testify were the Bents and Kit Carson, who was then stationed at Camp Nichols, a small post on the Cimarron branch of the Santa Fe Trail.

A major result of their testimony was a peace council on the Little Arkansas, with Black Kettle the first to sign the treaty which was drawn with Bent and Carson representing the government.

BLACK KETTLE'S band was the first to move south of the Arkansas to lands set aside for them in the treaty. Following them were other bands of Cheyennes and Arapahoes. The Kiowas, even those led by Satanta and Satank, were relatively peaceful except for raids into Texas. The only band of consequence still rampaging on the plains was the Dog Soldier Cheyennes, who had refused to sign the Little Arkansas Treaty.

Things were not quiet with the army, however. Under a reorganization of federal troops, Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock became commander of the Department of the Missouri. George A. Custer entered the scene through a provision in the reorganization which permitted formation of four regiments of cavalry.

The board selecting officers for the Seventh Cavalry named Col. Andrew J. Smith as commander with Custer as lieutenant colonel. Other officers accepted for the regiment included Maj. Joel Elliott, Capt. Myles Keogh and Lt. Thomas W. Custer, brother of George.

In March, 1867, the Hancock expedition, including the Seventh Cavalry, seven companies of infantry and a battery of artillery, left Fort Riley, Kansas. At Fort Harker, Col. J. H. Leavenworth, the Indian agent there, argued in vain that the Indians now were at peace and the expedition would only create trouble. His protests were echoed at Fort Larned by Indian Agent E. W. Wynkoop, former commander at Fort Lyon.

Hancock and Custer were not convinced, and told Wynkoop to call in the chiefs of a village of Cheyennes and Sioux on Pawnee Fork. Hancock insisted on a night meeting. He told the Indians they would have to return prisoners taken by Kiowas in Texas—prisoners they did not have. Was Hancock looking for an excuse to attack their village?

The next morning the expedition left Fort Larned, headed along the road up the Arkansas. At Pawnee Fork Hancock Kiowa Chief Satanta, a veteran of the Battle of the Washita, once fired an arrow through the arm of a sentry at Fort Larned, where Satanta was reporting for peace talks, when the sentry raised his gun. Uneasy events following that misfortune soon led to the Sand Creek massacre. Satanta, with Lone Wolf, later was held hostage by General Custer to force the Indian bands into surrendering.

Portions of several states, as the map indicates, figured prominently in General George Custer's early career in the West.

left the main trail and turned toward the Indian village. Was this to be another Sand Creek?

A delegation of Indians waited on the trail. As the column of troops drew near, Custer's cavalry, which had been at the rear of the column, rushed to the front. The Indians, believing the attack was starting, sent word to abandon the village.

The chiefs and some warriors remained to talk with Hancock. When he was told the villagers had fled, he told the chiefs to gather their people and they would not be harmed. Hancock apparently thought the Indians were hiding in the village for he ordered Custer to surround the village as soon as possible under cover of darkness and then attack. Custer led a mighty charge into a camp of empty lodges.

In a letter written that night to his wife, Custer said: "The 7th Cavalry surrounded the village at 12 o'clock tonight. There were 250 lodges, but the bird has flown, leaving his lodges behind. . . . I am to pursue them at daylight. . . ."

By nightfall the cavalry had found none of the thousand or so Indians who had been in the camp. Hancock's expedition continued to campaign across the plains but it was mostly wasted effort.

There were other results. The Indians answered the attempted massacre of the Pawnee Fork village by attacking any place there were white men. Almost 300 whites were killed in the raids.

GEN. WILLIAM T. SHERMAN set up headquarters at Fort Sedgwick in northeastern Colorado. He sent Lieutenant Kidder, with ten troopers and a scout, with new orders for Custer. The detail was met by a band of Sioux and Cheyennes. Soon the soldiers were dead, riddled with arrows.

When Custer learned that Kidder had been sent out, he started searching for him. During the search, thirteen men, seven of them mounted, left camp. Custer sent a detail after them. When the deserters refused to halt, the troops opened fire. The mounted men escaped but one of those on foot was killed and two wounded. The other three surrendered.

When Custer arrived at Fort Wallace he decided to go to Fort Hays to see his wife. There he found she had gone to Fort Riley. He followed her, leaving his command at the other end of Kansas.

The court-martial of Lt. Col. George A. Custer opened at Fort Leavenworth in September, 1867. The charges alleged that Custer had been absent from his command without proper authority; had taken no action to rescue stragglers who had been attacked by Indians and made no effort to recover the bodies of two who had been killed; had issued orders which resulted in a suspected deserter being killed; had caused others to be wounded and refused medical care for them. There were other, less important, counts. Custer was convicted on all charges and suspended for one year.

The Hancock campaign was over. Four Indians had been killed, two of them by Kidder's men. The expedition had cost more than $9 million.

AFTER the Hancock campaign, Agents Leavenworth and Wynkoop were assigned to arrange a conference with the southern tribes. They contacted Black Kettle and through him a meeting was arranged on the Little Arkansas. There, in preliminary council they agreed to make peace talks at an old Kiowa medicine lodge on a stream which had come to be known as Medicine Lodge Creek, not far from Fort Larned.

By October the area along the creek was crowded with camps. Almost every band of the Southern Plains was represented, some in entirety.

On the commission, authorized by Congress and headed by Nathaniel G. Taylor, were Maj. Gen. William S. Harney, Maj. Gen. C. C. Augur, Maj. Gen. Alfred H. Terry, John B. Sanburn, Samuel F. Tappan and J. B. Henderson. Among advisers to the commission were Leavenworth, Wynkoop and George Bent. Major

Black Kettle headed the Cheyenne chiefs with Bull Bear, Little Bear and White Horse representing the Dog Soldier Cheyennes. Little Raven and Yellow Bear led the Arapaho delegation. Satank and Satanta were the chief delegates of the Kiowas while the Comanche representatives included Ten Bears and Iron Mountain.

Harney knew about the Indian wars first hand. In 1854 near Fort Laramie trouble had flared over a cow owned by an emigrant. A Sioux killed the cow and agreement could not be reached on payment. A detachment of thirty-two men, led by Lieutenant Grattan, left Fort Laramie determined to force the Sioux to pay the owner's price. The officer and his thirty-two men were killed.

An expedition was sent out, commanded by Harney, then a colonel. On the North Platte, at Ash Hollow, Harney attacked a Sioux village, killing eighty-six, many of them women and children. Taken as hostages were seventy women and children. Now Harney was among those who sought peace by treaty.

Two treaties were written at Medicine Lodge—one applying to the Cheyennes and Arapahoes and signed by their chiefs, the other applying to the Kiowas and Comanches and signed by them. In the main, the treaties were identical, differing only in special lands set aside for the tribes and other specific items.

The treaties outlined responsibility of the government in keeping others from trespassing on land given to the signing tribes, punishment of wrong-doing by any of the Indians, establishment of agency offices, and distribution of supplies needed by the Indians as they "walked the white man's road," approval of land for farming for any Indians wanting it and schools for children from age six to sixteen.

When the treaty was signed October 28, 1867, the Indians headed south of the Arkansas to their assigned lands. The government commission turned north to negotiate similar treaties with the Sioux, Northern Cheyennes, Arapahoes and Utes.

Congress did not act on the Medicine Lodge Treaty until July of 1868. During this time the Indians, not understanding white man's politics, waited for the supplies which had been promised. It was in this atmosphere of growing impatience that Gen. Philip Sheridan took command of the Department of the Missouri in March.

Disputes were reported between the Kaws, wards of the government, and the Cheyennes. The Superintendent of Indian Affairs ordered Wynkoop to withhold arms and ammunition, which were included in the supplies.

When the Indians gathered at Fort Larned in July for the first supplies under the treaty, Black Kettle told Wynkoop the Indians felt the white men were "pulling away" the hand that had been given them at Medicine Lodge.

In his report to the Superintendent of Indian Affairs, Wynkoop said: "They felt much disappointment but gave no evidence of being angry . . . . I was cognizant of their having been treated badly by whites since the treaty . . . in no

MORMON MOUNTAIN'S SILVER MYSTERY

This mine is lost because a trail is lost—and the men who walked it are dead

ARIZONA'S mystery mountain of silver stands menacingly dark and brooding twenty-six miles southeast of Flagstaff. Several men have vanished there or were murdered under unknown circumstances. So secret has been the search for the legendary metal that the names of only a handful were known. Most slipped in, lived like the wary coyote, and went their separate ways into nowhere.

There is no doubt of the silver's existence. At one time at least a hundred people in the mountain town owned one or more chunks of it. The problem has been to find the lode on the mountain and then successfully claim it. A few have brought out rich ore; others, failing, died because of the secret anyway.

Jim Taylor and Ike Roberts, who supposedly were first to find the silver, were looking for something else. That venture goes back to the Mormon colonizer Lot Smith, who set up a summer grazing camp on the west side of Mormon Lake in 1877. The following year he brought in settlers and a dairy herd. The place then became known as Mormon Dairy.

That same year, 1878, Lessa Rogers, a Mormon, wandering around between the base of the mountain and the lakeshore, found a cache of gold coins. It was a sheer accident. They totaled more than $6,000. Smith saw the hoard when Rogers packed it home.

"That's too much money for such as you," Smith declared and promptly appropriated it. Rogers did not protest, but in his anger talked to other people of the injustice done him.

Taylor and Roberts were in Flagstaff at this time. Seasoned prospectors, they had scoured southern and central Arizona and parts of the Grand Canyon. They had detailed knowledge of a stage holdup which had occurred east of Yuma in 1872.

Two bandits had escaped with a rich haul in gold coins. Fleeing north and over the Mogollon Rim they planned to hide out in the wilderness area until lawmen forgot about the holdup. Soon after burying the loot for safekeeping they were struck by a band of Mexican horse thieves from St. Johns who mistook them for officers. One bandit was killed; the other managed to get on his horse. He fled south to Camp Verde, arriving in a delirious condition. Before dying from his wounds he babbled about caching the loot at the base of an unnamed mountain. Taylor and Roberts knew all this, and something more important. The name of the mystery mountain was then Longfellow. They were considerably excited after hearing Rogers' story because they knew the loot was three times what he found.

LEAVING Flagstaff in the night, Taylor and Roberts reached the mountain, skirting the Mormon settlement. Locating Rogers' shallow holes at the base they spent a week in futile digging, then searched the mouth of a nearby canyon. Finally they climbed on up the mountain, by then called "Mormon" because of the settlement, and somewhere on it they found an outcropping of silver ore. Within a few days they had uncovered an extensive lode, and had taken out more than 400 pounds of the richest chunks. Everything was covered up before, of necessity, they pulled out for Flagstaff. Their grub had run out.

A metallurgist in Flagstaff informed them that the silver content was low grade. It could run as high as $100, possibly $200 to the ton. Both men were extremely disappointed.

"It ain't worth freighting all the way to the Globe mill," Taylor declared bitterly.

"The railroad is headed this way," Roberts reminded him. "When it goes through we can ship it cheap and make money. That damned mountain is all silver!"

They discussed their find around the saloons, especially with a gambler friend, C. E. (Pap) Williams, who offered to grubstake them. The silver mine would be opened after the railroad reached there.

Roberts and Taylor departed with their ore samples, and their tale was soon forgotten. It revived briefly when the Atlantic Pacific Railroad (now the Santa Fe) built through to California. A few who remembered the two prospectors wondered when they would return. But they never showed up in Flagstaff.

LAST CATTLE of the LONG AFTER California had become bustling and populous, and the Comanches and other tribes had been driven from the Texas plains, a little corner of the West was uninhabited. This area, to become McKenzie County, North Dakota, lay beneath the curve of the Little Missouri River and included many acres of potentially fine grazing land. Although General Sully and his troops had made a difficult passage through this country in the 1880s, it wasn't until Pierre Wibaux, a Frenchman with resources in the Old World, drove a large herd of cattle up from the south and built a ranch near the North Dakota - Montana line that the settlement of the area really began.

Wibaux's enterprise soon failed, however, and in 1894 he and his partner, a man named Greasy, split the herd. Wibaux rounded up his share—20,000 cows and 10,000 calves—and drove them to the Northern Pacific stockyards at the newly established community of Mingusville (now Wibaux), Montana. After he left, many of his riders stayed in the country and began ranching operations of their own.

One of the stories the old-timers tell concerns a cowboy called "Poker Jim" (he had no other name as far as anyone knew). He had come by his nickname because he was fascinated by the gaming tables; the only thing he liked better was whiskey. During the severe winter of '94, Jim and some companions were stationed at a line camp at the mouth of Hay Draw near the Little Missouri. By February their food supply had gotten so low they delegated Jim to ride to Glendive, at least sixty-five miles away. He never made it back and a week or so later some cowboys found his frozen body propped against a huge burnt rock beside a little frozen creek about ten miles from homebase. His horse was tied to a tree and had eaten all the bark from it; burned matches lying about the corpse gave evidence that Poker Jim had tried to build a fire.

Harlowe (Tough) Bentley said Jim had seemed to be a little sick from drinking when he'd left the Smith Creek line camp that last morning. The poor fellow was buried at the W-Bar on a low hill, a site which became the burying ground for later pioneers. The burnt rock beside which he sat has been moved to the gravesite as a marker.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, later to become President of the United States, added glamor to the ranching industry of North Dakota when he came west in 1883 to hunt buffalo, and stayed to make it his home. He was fascinated with the scenery of the Badlands and selected a beautiful spot near the river surrounded by tall cottonwood trees to build his Elk Horn Ranch home in 1884. It is recorded that he rode on the roundups as any other cowboy and was popular with the other ranchers. The Elk Horn is situated in the area between the North and South units of the Theodore Roosevelt National Memorial Park, named for him in later years. Except for pieces of the foundation and an old well, nothing remains of the ranch today and the site is almost inaccessible.

The Marquis de Mores, a Frenchman of large ideas but small finances, was another early rancher who settled the little town of Medora, which had been named after his wife. Besides a large cattle ranch, he built a meat packing plant (parts of which are still standing) and an immense home, now a tourist attraction furnished with many of the Marquis' possessions. His wife never enjoyed her stay in the Badlands, however, and in a short while went back to her home in the East. The Marquis was a controversial figure among his contemporaries in the ranching business. He never became friends with the men around him and did not understand the ways of the West, which traits contributed to his eventual failure. The Marquis and Roosevelt, however, got along well although they were dissimilar in many ways.

Teddy Roosevelt once spoke of this area as the place where "the romance of my life began."

AFTER 1900, many small cattle- and horse-ranchers came to the country, or stayed and settled after having been employed by some of the large outfits. Most of these newcomers were from Texas, Oklahoma and South Dakota. Most of the horsemen came from South Dakota, including the noted Scott Gore, who settled in partnership with his father and brother on the east bank of the Little Missouri around 1901. His home is now owned and operated by the world famous and world-champion rodeo rider, Alvin Nelson.

My father, Archie McIntyre, came to the country from the Cannonball ranching area south of Bismarck, North Dakota in 1902. He homesteaded near the mouth of Redwing Creek, very near the west bank of the Little Missouri and, in partnership with a man by the name of Wiley Marten, ran cattle for the United States Government. These cattle supplied meat for the Indians on the Standing Rock Reservation south of Bismarck. A queer thing happened when they took their first herd by trail to the Reservation. On the last night, they made camp near Fort Yates, their destination, and when father awoke in the morning, Mr. Marten had disappeared. He was never seen again in those parts. My father had never asked him anything about his past life but assumed that for some reason he was afraid to be seen at the fort.

Among those who stayed in the country after working for Mr. Wibaux were Lem Burns, John Leakey, Tough Bentley, "Lucky" George Burgoyne, and a questionable character by name of McPeak. McKenzie County had been organized in 1889 and covered nearly all the land between the Little Missouri and the Yellowstone Rivers except a small part on the east side of the Yellowstone which belonged to Montana. The 101 Ranch was built near the line on the North Dakota side and was run by Lige Mulkey, an upright man. Suspicions that a rustling outfit was operating on Mulkey's ranch grew when bedrolls were discovered hidden in the tops of trees in several coulees nearby.

A deputy sheriff from Dickinson, seventy-five miles to the southeast, came and organized a posse among the cattlemen. They closed in on the 101 and found a rope corral with some stock in it. They laid in waiting until the rustlers, led by McPeak, arrived, then the sheriff yelled for them to put up their hands. The shouting frightened the bronc which McPeak was riding and when he made an attempt to turn the horse, it fell on him. Some shooting followed; McPeak and another young man were fatally wounded. Before he died, McPeak declared that if he only could have reached his gun, there would have been some dead deputies. Many of the old-timers agreed that some of the deputies would have deserved it, as they had pretty shady reputations themselves.

Other men at the ranch suspected of belonging to the rustling ring were taken to jail. John Leakey was proved innocent and released. Another man escaped but was recaptured later and sent to prison.

Lucky George built a small ranch in Jud Gap, a few miles east of the old 101, and there he shot a man on his doorstep in self-defense. Lucky is also buried in the W-Bar cemetary. McPeak was interred on Boot Hill, but there is a small creek in the neighborhood of the 101 named after him.

When my father came to the country in 1902, he found John Leakey settled on the Little Missouri, very successfully running 18,000 head of cattle. He and my father had become acquainted while they were riding the Sweetgrass country in Montana several years before. They remained good friends through the years. Leakey's ranch was only about ten miles north of Roosevelt's famous Elk Horn. Tough Bentley settled a few miles from us and was very successful, owning and leasing much land. At one time he and Leakey had over eighty-four sections of land under their control. Bentley was a small man, but rugged, as his nickname would indicate. His wife had been the first lady teacher in Wibaux, having been sent from Iowa because the big boys in the Wibaux school had run off every male teacher who had been hired. Mrs. Bentley, however, had had no difficulty with them: after knowing her, it was easy to understand why. The drift fence ran between our place and their land, and I saw her and her daughter riding along the fence every summer, repairing it as capably as any man could.

LEM BURNS settled in the Sheep Buttes area about the time of the 101 incident, and planned to write a book about his ranching experiences until he was threatened with a lawsuit by some of the surviving members of the gang and relatives of the others who still lived in the country. However, John Leakey, after retiring from his ranching business and returning to his childhood home at Uvalde, Texas, had his memoirs written and they included an eye-witness account of the affair. My information was supplied by the late Steve Douglas, foreman of the 101 ranch in 1900 and a good friend of my family.

There did not seem to be much trouble with sheepmen coming into the country, although some did appear in 1903. A Mr. McArthur and his partner, Mr. Jordan, were running at least 8,000 head in the Bennepierre vicinity by 1904. Hoping to become a large operation, they sent to Scotland for expert herders. John Sutherland and John McRae came to work for McArthur. During the winter of 1905, there was so much snow and the weather was so severe that the sheep died by the hundreds. Sutherland's band of 5,000 head, being grazed in the Sheep Buttes area, were caught in a sleet storm and half of the band was lost.

McArthur's venture was anything but a success. However, an interesting incident took place at his home ranch. A young hired man of McArthur asked his sweetheart back East to come to North Dakota and they would be married, inferring he had a large "spread" of his own. She came, and the ceremony was performed. The bride became disillusioned after giving several orders to the mistress of the house, Mrs. McArthur, who became suspicious and forced the young man to confront his bride with the truth. The girl did not follow her first inclination and leave him on the spot, but stayed to help, and soon the couple had their own home and spent many happy years together. He became a prominent man and had a fine reputation.

The Little Missouri River country is still a thriving ranch area with some third-generation owners operating on a small scale. This probably is the last perfectly natural setting for ranching in North Dakota. Outside of Mr. Roosevelt and de Mores, few of the early settlers here have ever been accorded mention, even in our own state archives; nevertheless, they made a contribution to the cattleman's last frontier.

At 22 years of age, Kipp was a guide and interpreter for the 13th Infantry then garrisoned at Fort Shaw, M.T. Note the army trousers.

THE OPPRESSIVE DARKNESS of the moonless night gave way slightly to the stars. Stealthily as any stalking warrior, the youth crept closer to the silent Indian camp. His hazardous route, past outlying wickiups and other obstacles, was clearly defined in his mind. Charted from keen observations from a safe distance in the hour before dusk, the mental map was serving the intruder well.

Young Joe Kipp, or Kipah, as he was known to the Piegans, moved with ever-increasing caution toward his objective.

Tepees of the Blackfeet Indians. It was from a similar camp that Kipp stole back the prize black stallion. From Sport Among the Rockies.

His advance was so hushed that even the multitude of camp dogs were not aroused. Amid the lodges of the slumbering Blackfeet, Kipp had no difficulty in identifying the tepee of White Antelope.

His final move was accomplished with great speed. Discarding all caution, the boy leaped to his feet and covered in seconds the remaining few yards which separated him from White Antelope's shelter. As he reached his goal, he drew a knife from his belt and severed, with a single slash, the picket rope of a large black stallion which was tethered there. Scarcely a second had elapsed before he was mounted and riding wildly back over the trail, clinging to his horse's mane.

The sudden and unexpected commotion stirred the camp life. White Antelope and several others, after losing precious time in securing ponies, set out after the diminishing hoofbeats of the big charger. They fired several shots in Kipp's direction, but by the time dawn's faint light allowed them any advantage, the big black had far outdistanced them. In one of his few acts of aggression against the people he came to know and love so well, Joe Kipp was home free.

JAMES KIPP, father of Joe, was a Montreal-born Scotsman. At twenty-four, in 1822, he migrated to the United States and in 1828 entered the service of the American Fur Company and became a trusted lieutenant of famed pioneer-trader Kenneth McKenzie. James Kipp was later to build Fort Union at the mouth of the Yellowstone River. The Upper Missouri River country at that time was the bailiwick of such mountain giants as Bridger, Sublette, Fitzpatrick and the legendary Jedediah Smith. The great American Fur Company had been founded by John Jacob Astor in 1808 and later became the holdings of Ramsay Crooks and the Pratte-Chouteau Company. Kipp was the company's mainstay in what is now Montana.

Several smaller forts and posts were established to facilitate fur gathering and were supervised by James Kipp. In 1831, and following in the footsteps of many other stalwarts who opened this vast frontier, he married the daughter of an Indian chief. Kipp's bride was the daughter of the great Mandan, "Man-to-to-pah" or Four Bears. Her name was "Sah-kwi-ah-ki" or Earth Woman. Their son Joseph was born at Fort Union in 1847.

Between the years 1847-1860 when the elder Kipp retired from an active role in the fur trade, young Joe learned much about self-preservation in a hostile land from his illustrious father. He was soon to put this knowledge to good use. During the gradual decline of the fur trade, James Kipp was to purchase a large farming property in Missouri where he would spend most of his time. Joseph and his mother were to remain in their home near Fort Benton, M. T.

In 1865 George Steel and Matt Carroll purchased the American Fur Company's holdings in Fort Benton. Exhibiting business acumen far beyond his years, young Joe Kipp was hired to clerk in the store. An additional duty, and one in which he took a special pride, was the care and grooming of George Steel's prize black stallion. If Mr. Steel and the young groom appreciated the finer points of the beautiful animal, let it be said that the Blackfeet (long and properly recognized for their incomparable ability at horse thievery), who were frequently at the fort to trade, secretly coveted the beast as a welcome addition to their own herds. Exhibiting a choice piece of horseflesh before the tribesmen was akin to tantalizing a hungry child with a handful of candy. Something was bound to happen.

Arriving at work one morning, young Joe discovered the corral gate open and the padlock torn from the stable door. Mr. Steel's big black charger was gone. Completely dismayed, the boy pleaded with Steel to be allowed to search the numerous nearby Blackfeet villages. Steel, prudent and somewhat fearful of Joe's safety, refused to give his permission.

In the days that followed, an old Indian "hanger-on" at the trading post constantly chided Kipp about the loss of the horse. Seeking information, Joe managed to sneak a pint of whiskey to the old man and shortly his whiskey-loosened tongue was boasting that his nephew, White Antelope, "had the best buffalo horse in the country—a big, black, swift horse." He also disclosed that White Antelope and his followers were currently camped on the not-too-distant Teton River. Thus evolved Joe's midnight invasion of the sanctity of the Blackfeet village and the daring recovery of Steel's horse.

Although sworn to revenge, White Antelope, several days later and upon a chance meeting with Kipp outside the settlement, was backed down and sent on his way by an icy stare and a cocked rifle in the boy's hands.

FOR HIS guile and devotion, George Steel rewarded Kipp with a year's schooling at the St. Ignatius Mission School at St. Joseph, Missouri. In 1868 following his only session with formal education, Kipp declined reemployment at Fort Benton and, with cronies Charlie Thomas and John Wrenn, set out on a gold prospecting trip along the eastern slope of the Rockies. Their quest took them as far north as Edmonton in the Alberta Province of Canada. The excursion was a financial bust and their welcome at Edmonton, long a stronghold of the Hudson's Bay Company, was less than cordial.

(On their way north, the trio stopped near a creek to shoe some of their horses. During the process they lost a pair of pincers. Kipp, upon discovering the loss, returned several miles over the trail to the creek-bank to recover them. Today, this little stream, about forty miles north of Cardston, Alberta still bears the name, Pincer Creek.)

Joe Kipp was back in Montana land early in 1869. This Upper Missouri real estate was now the scene of considerable whiskey-inspired turbulence. A condition verging on war existed between the Blackfeet and the ever-increasing white settlers. The surge of trade whiskey which was flooding the Whoop-Up Trail was rapidly becoming tinged with blood. This infamous road, running northward from Fort Benton on the Missouri to Fort McLeod, Canada, meandered directly through the heart of the Blackfeet country, and the days of colored beads and other trifles were gone. Competition for the Indians' hides and plews, even in the dwindling market, was keen and the tribesmen wanted whiskey.

The Indians held a geographical advantage. If they couldn't trade to their liking at the posts south of the border, the Hudson's Bay Company (or the H. B. C., commonly referred to as "Here Before Christ") was their welcome host north of the line. Whiskey and warpaint didn't mix and Montana settlers suffered greatly as a result.

General Phillip DeTrobriand, a much more accomplished historian than he was a soldier, fell heir to the mess. In spite of his doing his level best to keep the peace, the roaming redskins could not be controlled. DeTrobriand, seeking out those who knew the Indians best,

Joe Kipp's store in the town of Robare was the last remaining building in the nearly forgotten town on Birch Creek, Pondera County, Montana. Nothing is visible today to indicate the location.

hired Joe Kipp as scout and guide for the 13th Infantry then stationed at Fort Shaw, M.T. This assignment, which Joe assumed with pride at the onset, was to culminate in the blackest episode in his life.

EARLY in the fall of 1869, the murder by Indians of rancher and ex-fur trader Malcolm Clarke, elevated from embers to holocaust the long-smouldering fires which were to be extinguished so hideously for 173 Blackfeet on the Marias River on January 23, 1870.

Years later Joe Kipp gave the following statement to the Blackfeet Agent in an effort to right some wrongs and perhaps straighten out some military liability matters. The deposition, made several months before his sudden death in 1913, is plainly an attempt to aid several friends and persons who had become related to him through marriage and adoption. They had sought restitution for losses incurred by their predecessors at the time of the Marias Massacre. Colonel E. M. Baker's premature attack on the friendly Chief Heavy Runner's village and the resultant losses in life and property precipitated the claims.

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN:

I was employed at Fort Shaw, Montana as guide and interpreter in 1869-70. At that time there was not a very friendly feeling existing between the Whites and the Indians owing to the killing of one Malcolm Clark. The Whites took offense and the Indians became aggressive, and the matter ran a long time without definite action being taken against Pete Owl Child (Indian), the murderer of Clark. The Civil Authorities and the United States Marshal were powerless. Col. Wheeler consulted me in regard to bringing Pete Owl Child to trial. I heard it said that Pete Owl Child had stated that he would never be taken alive. Thus matters drifted along. I made several trips to Pete's camp to try to locate him but could not do so because nobody would give me any information as to his whereabouts. I returned to the Fort [Fort Shaw] each time and made my report that I could not locate the man, Pete Owl Child. I could see no other way than for the Military to arrest Pete and so recommended. I was consulted several times as to what course to pursue to effect the arrest of Pete Owl Child. I told the Commanding Officer at Fort Shaw, Gen. De Tri Briand, that the best way to arrest Pete Owl Child was to employ the Military force. General Canby was sent out from Washington, D. C. to try to ascertain the best way to effect this arrest without fighting. My recollection is that after several days consultation, the United States Marshal ordered the soldiers to go to the camp of Pete Owl Child and demand his surrender, and, if the Indians refused to give him up, and he refused to submit to arrest, to take him forcibly, and if the Indians opened fire to return their fire. These soldiers were under the command of Col. E. M. Baker of Fort Ellis.

The BUTTERFIELD OVERLAND STAGE

By ARIZONA BOB KUBISTA

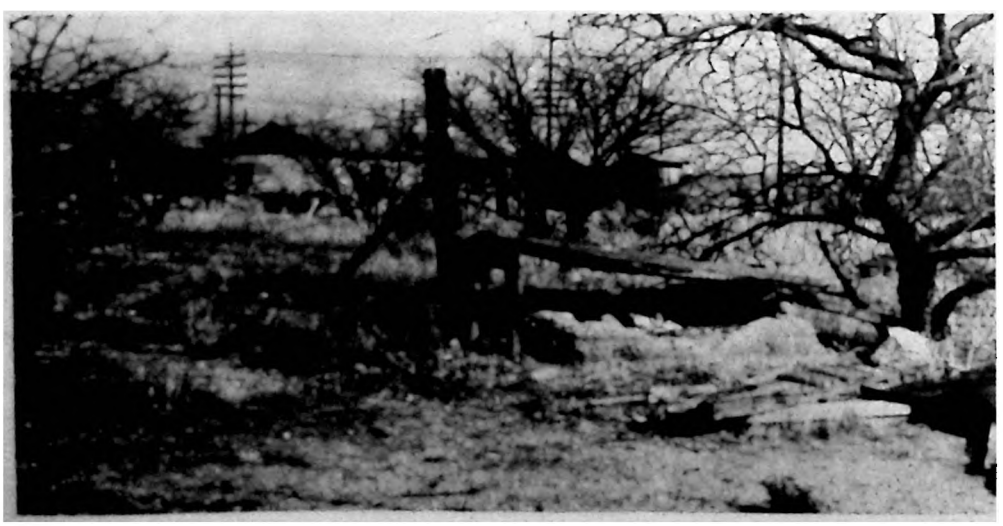
At Point of Mountain, the original stage route hugs the rocky hillside before racing on to Rillito, Arizona.

ON A sunny day on the outskirts of Tucson, Arizona I knelt in the dust with my youngest son to touch the shallow ruts of an old wagon trail which once was the Butterfield Stage route. Across a shallow gully and beyond a field of cactus, cars were speeding toward the West on a concrete slab called U. S. 80 while here at our feet was evidence of an earlier mode of travel that was fortunate to average eight miles an hour! The contrast gave a feeling of unreality to the warm afternoon.

The old trail is faint; still, it can be traced for long miles where it crossed Southern Arizona on the Southern Overland route to the Pacific Coast. My boy and I were near Vail, a junction to the southeast of Tucson where many people turn off the main highway to enter the city from the east side. A graded road skirts the Rincon Mountains, turns around the corner of the Davis-Monthan Air Force Base and enters town on the "Old Spanish Trail." What is not generally known is that this same road crosses the original Butterfield Overland Stage route which ran this way for three years, between 1858 and 1861.

Only an old post office stands near the original Butterfield route as it passes through Vail.



Over a century has gone by since the passing of the original "John Butterfield Overland Mail Company." It is remarkable that any traces of its colorful history remain. The stage route is difficult to follow, but it can be done even today because the gentle climate has been kind to the land. To follow the road cross-country one needs patience, a supply of old maps or modern topographic maps in the largest scale obtainable, a four-wheeled-drive vehicle, and a healthy imagination. The best time to trace the route is early in the morning or late in the afternoon when the long shadows thrown by the sun reveal the ruts left by passing Concord coaches one hundred years ago.

The Butterfield Overland Stage ran from St. Louis, Missouri, to San Francisco, California, covering almost 2,800 miles and passing through Tucson and Los Angeles on the way. Passengers and mail made the trip twice weekly and never spent more than twenty-five days on the road. The line began actual operations in September 1858 when it began to replace the makeshift San Antonio & San Diego Mail instituted on August 7 of the previous year.

The Butterfield Line was known by many names and was sometimes called the "Overland Mail" and the "32nd Parallel Line" because it crossed southern Arizona at about thirty-two degrees latitude. The route itself was officially known as "Mail Route 12587." To this day railroads, highways, and underground pipelines follow the same general route. The original scouts and surveyors had a fine feel for the land and chose roads which made the best possible use of easy terrain and available water—at the same time avoiding Indian areas whenever they could. Sometimes they were not successful and tragedies followed.

THEIR ROUTE crossed Coronado's Trail east of Tucson and several times that of the Mormon Battalion which had gone this way in 1847. In operation from September 1858 until March 1861, when the Civil War began, it did a creditable job of moving men and mail during its short life. As far as Arizona Territory was concerned, the stagecoaches entered the present state on the New Mexico border near "Stein's." It went west from there through Apache Pass and by old Fort Bowie, crossed the San Pedro River north of Benson, continued toward Tucson and turned north there. From Tucson it went roughly to Maricopa Wells where it turned west again, going to Yuma. West of Yuma it crossed the sand dunes to eventually reach the Pacific Coast at Los Angeles. Inside Arizona there were at least twenty-six known stations, not all of which may have been in operation at one time.

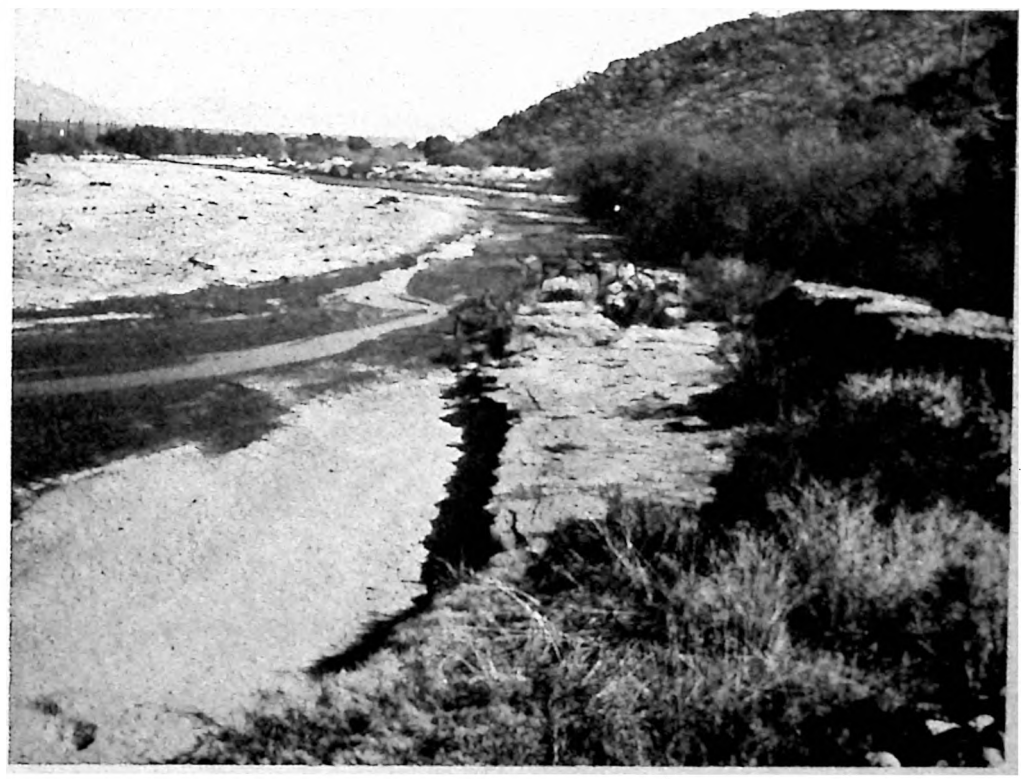
The stage route west of Benson, Arizona, wends its way down saguaro-covered slopes on the way to Vail, close to Pantano Wash.



North of Tucson the Butterfield Overland route has been almost completely washed away by flash floods racing down the Santa Cruz River.

The actual names of the various stations are exciting in themselves and bring back a flood of stories that are part of the Old West. Stations were sometimes known by their official names, sometimes by the names of the towns or settlements they were in or near. They were spread across the arid land at varying distances — sometimes eight, sometimes thirty miles apart. The governing factor was having horses ready when the oncoming team was getting tired. In rough, mountainous country stations were closer together. In open grama grass country stations were farther apart. Usually each one was near a source of water or a natural river crossing.

A century ago the Southwest was different from today. Many of the rivers ran regularly and fording was often done, especially after a desert storm. In other places the desert stretched out for miles, and water was not to be had except where a shallow well had been dug. The lives of horses and men depended absolutely upon reaching those wells and all too often they were not reached in time. Indians, accidents and the dry, hot climate all took their toll. Traveling the Butterfield route was a dirty, tiresome experience, but there was no other way. Travel in 1858 meant plain hard work.

Way-stations were usually simple adobe buildings and did not resemble in the slightest the stage depots which existed in the few towns along the route. They served no purpose other than sustaining the stage line. Towns rarely grew from

We believe these pictures were shots of the Southern Pacific line from New Orleans to San Francisco, taken after 1881 when Huntington bought out the Texas and New Orleans.

TROUBLE RODE OUT OF CHIHUAHUA

FORTY-FIVE years have made a few changes around the border country of New Mexico—Cloverdale, Animas, Hachita, and the ranches; Culberson, High Lonesome, Grey, Lang, Alamo Hueco, Dog Springs, and the Corner.

The Indians had moved out long before we moved to Dog Springs in the early twenties, but since our Chihuahua neighbors to the south were still active and restless, I wasn't one bit unhappy that the old ranch house was strong and solid. Three-foot walls of adobe were rather comforting when my Mormon neighbors filled me in on the killing of three or four (maybe more—it's been a long time) cowboys at the Corner Ranch while they were branding calves in the corral.

There were no survivors so the ranchers and neighbors had to guess at what must have taken place. The boys' rifles were found leaning inside the corral. Of course, most of them also wore six-guns. But the Mexicans only rode to the border gate—according to the horse tracks, there must have been a bunch of them. They probably asked directions or acted in such a friendly manner that the unsuspecting cowboys moved away from the protection of the corral and their rifles. Those who were not shot down at once were roped and dragged to death. Parts of the bodies were found just a short way below our Dog Springs corral four miles up the valley from the Corner Ranch. Karl Peterson, now of Nogales, lost a brother in this bunch.

I was only about nineteen at this time and had heard about, even seen, a few outlaws around Christoval, Eldorado, Sonora, and San Angelo, Texas, where I was born in Tom Green County, but I had never been this near the action before.

The old adobe house at Dog Springs had been built for protection from the Indians first and Mexicans later—three big bedrooms across the front, with two rooms leading back in a wing on the north side, leaving a south ell. At that time, part of the adobe corral was used to pen their saddle horses close enough at night to keep the Indians from setting the old boys afoot. It was connected to the ell corners of the house at the back, and is still standing. There were no baseboards in the house, and we found out that rattlesnakes liked to den up under the floor.

We usually ate our noon meal around 2 or 2:30 p.m., as my husband, Otis, rode the range early and had a big one to cover. There were no pickups or horse trailers to haul horses where he wanted to start his ride. He had to start from the home ranch and cover as much ground as he could in one direction, and in the afternoon double back and pick up uncovered range in another direction. That way all our range was about covered every three or four days. It was always a long wait between eats and sometimes, according to what you ran into in the way of work, no cats till dark.

WHEN my mother, Ivy Sims, came for a visit we put a bed in the combination dining room and kitchen so that she could be near us at night. She, too, was a little jittery so close to the border. My table was a drop-leaf affair and the back of my husband's chair was to this bed. One day, he had just settled down and piled his plate with food and he and my mother were eating. I was standing at the table, pouring milk and coffee before sitting down. Suddenly I froze (in July). My first thought was "cat"; then in a flash, I bent to see what had brushed my foot because our cat was not that gentle. The biggest, fattest, longest rattlesnake I ever saw was moving slowly from under the table to the safety of the crack where the baseboards should have been.

When I yelled, "Snake!" Otis and Mama didn't wait to ask where. Otis simply heaved himself backward onto my clean bed, boots, spurs, and all, and my mother landed right up in the bed with him. His gun was hanging on the foot of the bedpost, and he grabbed it and shot the snake just as it was about one-third out of the room. We were pretty sure he had killed the snake even though it squeezed on down, because it left quite a bit of blood on the floor. I always heard that rattlesnakes travel in pairs, and where you see one, another one is usually pretty close by.

Since our baby Lorraine, was only about four months old at the time, and even though the Alamo Hueco cowboys had made her a little crib with legs over twenty-eight inches high, I could still imagine a snake crawling up into bed with her. All afternoon we watched and listened for him, but as night came on and Otis walked over the floor with spurs jingling, and still no action, we decided the rattler was dead.

Sleep was restless, nights uneasy on the border. With the signal fires of Red Flaggers lighting up the hills, Anglo settlers brooded about their horses—and their own vulnerable throats!

We had only oil or kerosene lamps, and since there were plenty of shadowy places in the bedroom, I selected the top of the trunk to remove my clothes and slippers. My husband was sitting on the side of the bed, grinning at my being so jumpy, when he dropped his first boot to the floor and all Hades broke loose. That old snake sang out and sounded like he was right under Otis' feet. He pulled the baby's bed over by the side of ours and I stepped from the top of the trunk to the bed and let the darn lamp burn all night.

Otis rose a little later next morning, too. It was fairly bright in the room from daylight when he checked under the bed and looked all around before putting his feet to the floor. He was already dressed. We had slept with our clothes on the bed, and that is where we dressed. While I fixed breakfast, he moved the beds and tore up some boards until he located the rattlesnake coiled on a ledge of rock just under the floor. He killed it but this one had never been shot before, so Otis had evidently made good on the one he hit the day before.

By 8:30 he was on his way to Alamo Hueco for lumber to put in baseboards, and he brought back one of the ranch boys, Jack Missal, to help him. That was how I got my first "home improvement."

Even though snakes never got into the front part of the house again, one of the ell rooms at the back was still favored by their presence. We hung our beef and stored canned goods, potatoes, and other vegetables out there. The potatoes were kept in a bin under a window that reached almost to the floor. Otis had gone to jingle horses one morning and I had gone into the storeroom to get some potatoes. As I crossed to the window, I saw him coming with the saddle horses, and I was watching them trot down the long slope to the corral as I reached out for the potatoes. Suddenly something told me to check where I was putting my hand. When I looked down, a snake had his old rusty head and about eight inches of his body stretched up over that sack, his beady eyes watching, and black tongue going ninety miles an hour.

I ran and yelled to Otis that there was a rattlesnake in the potatoes. He was saddling his day horse and barely glanced my way as he yelled back, "Kill it!" and kept right on with the business of the day. So there was me or the snake to back down. It is surprising how much confidence a bullet can give to one and how much silence it can give to another. I had potatoes for lunch.

I DIDN'T come out so well with the Mexican situation. They scared me crazy a half dozen times or more. The road from Old Mexico into the States passed through "Ojo Perro," Dog Springs corral, below the spring down in front of our house. Huge fig trees, mixed with cottonwoods, grew all around a tank from the spring of cold water. Most of the travel through this road was made by the little farmers who watered their teams and spent the night at Ojo Perro before going on to Hachita for supplies. These Mexicans were usually very poor, and Hachita was closer to them than a town in Old Mexico, so they came across the line, traded, and went back into Mexico, giving very little trouble.

The ones we had to watch were the "proscriptos" (outlaws) or "red flaggers," as we called those who used Chihuahua as their headquarters. Sonora was never as full of these characters as Chihuahua. It was nothing for us to sit on our front porch in the twilight and watch signal fires, one after another as many as five or six at one time, light up on the hilltops of Old Mexico. And we never knew if the signals meant they were moving to devilment on the U.S. side or on business of their own.

One morning after a particularly busy evening of signal fires (probably had no connection, but I was jittery anyway), Otis had left to check the water and cattle at Conejo, a windmill about fourteen or fifteen miles from Ojo Perro. I was doing my dishes in the kitchen while I waited for the baby to wake up for her bath. I had a big Airedale dog, "Gompers," that one of the Pierce boys had given me soon after we moved to the ranch, and Otis always called him up onto the front screened porch and locked him in before leaving. The house was high in front, requiring six or eight steps to reach the high front porch.

Gompers was a good watchdog. We knew any Mexican would have to kill him to get into the house (they made good later on). All at once, Gompers started running up and down the porch, barking his head off. I hadn't heard a sound but, of course, the corral and spring were all down below the house at the end of a sharp slope. Yet I knew someone was around. The closest neighbors on our side of the line were ten or twelve miles horseback, longer around a road—and there were not many of those. I knew no neighbor would be coming by that early since no works were going on at the time.

I slipped into the middle bedroom where the baby was. We always kept a

.30-30 leaning in a corner by the window. The window was waist high and the walls three feet thick, but when I counted seven big Mexican hats moving along by the porch toward the steps, I wished the window could have been up to my eyes. I kept still, waiting to see what they were up to. Three of them climbed the steps, and as one of them had two bandoleers, one hanging from his shoulder, and was a little meaner looking than the others, I gathered he was their leader.

At any rate, they were all trying to figure out how to get the screen open with Gompers lunging against it as fast as he could hit the floor and bounce back. I was afraid he was going to break it down for them. When I saw one of them pull a skinning knife and say something to the leader, I pushed the Wild Old Days!

CAPTAIN JACK: LAST OF THE SCOUTS

By Paul T. Nolan

IN JANUARY, 1917, William F. (Buffalo Bill) Cody died. Could John Wallace (Captain Jack) Crawford now be considered the greatest of the Indian scouts? Crawford has been working for that position for over forty years, but his public who read the Literary Digest for March 24, 1917, would not have guessed his ambition.

"So Bill Cody has gone!" said Captain Jack [when informed of Buffalo Bill's death]. "I guess they will be sounding taps over me pretty soon. Well, when we meet Tall Bull and that tough old codger, Sitting Bull, and say, 'How, Kola!' there will be much to talk about!"

Within two months of Cody's death, Crawford was dead, too; and if the leading dramatic figures of the Indian wars of 1876 did meet, did say, "How, Kola!" there probably was a lot to talk about.

From 1876 until his death, Captain Jack labored valiantly to replace Buffalo Bill as the "Representative Man of the West." Crawford, who was born in Ireland in 1848, arrived in the United States just in time to enlist as an underaged, undersized private in the Civil War. Surviving that conflict after being twice wounded, he married and settled down in Pennsylvania for a few years. In the 1870s, the pioneer movement into the Dakotas started, and Crawford went west—looking for fame, glory, and a steady income.

He found some of all three in the Black Hills—and established himself as "The Poet Scout," writing of the joys of nature, the heroism of Cody and Custer, and the villainy of the Indians.

In 1876—after he received national newspaper attention for a 300-mile ride he made through Indian territory—he joined Buffalo Bill as an actor in a play called Life on the Border. The following year, while the two were performing in Virginia City, Nevada, Captain Jack was wounded in a stage fight. He later said that Buffalo Bill had stabbed him (or shot him) "through . . . drunkeness" and "left me on my back a stranger and penniless. . . ." This misunderstanding, however, did not end their relationship immediately.

As soon as Captain Jack recovered, he wrote a play, Fonda; or The Trapper's Dream, and wrote to Buffalo Bill for money to take the play to Australia. Cody promised him the money but never sent it, and Captain Jack's stage career ended for a time. Crawford returned to scouting, this time with the army in New Mexico.

Throughout his career in the Southwest, Crawford continued to chase the phantom "Reputation." He wrote a couple more plays—The Mighty Truth, about his scouting experiences in the Dakotas, and Colonel Bob, about his days in New Mexico; and he toured the country, preaching against the evils of drink and singing the praises of the West.

He made it clear that if justice were done him, the name of Captain Jack, The Poet Scout, would be writ large in the history of the frontier.

IN 1894, he wrote to Buffalo Bill after Cody had claimed sole possession of the title of "Scout." "Now," wrote Captain Jack, "why should you claim after Texas Jack [Omohundro] died that you were the only one left and King of them all. And yet you know that Texas Jack never was a Scout, never saw a hostile and never fought Indians, except with you on the mimic stage." In that same letter, Crawford put the matter straight, as he saw it: "I saw more actual Indian fighting and took more desperate chances than you ever did. . . . Of course I do not refer to the Indian fighting you had on the stage and in the Wild West Show in the last twenty-five years."

Crawford had a large following among church groups, YMCA groups and tent revival participants, but his audiences were more concerned with his attacks on the dime novel, cigarettes and booze than in his accounts of his days of glory. One of his favorite stories concerned Billy the Kid. He met Billy shortly before the young desperado's death, he said, and the Kid told him that he could trace his ruin from dime novels to cigarettes to wild women to wine to a life of crime. Crawford obviously liked the role of the natural moral philosopher, but it did not pay well—at least not as well as Cody was doing with audiences less opposed to the sins of the flesh. With every opportunity, Captain Jack leveled his charge that Cody was "libeling our glorious West" with "your blood and thunder 'red right hand' dime novel impossibilities . . . ."

The general opinion that Crawford was a scribbling imitation of Buffalo Bill continued throughout his life. In reporting Captain Jack's death, the New York Times could only offer this feeble subhead: "Scout was friend of Buffalo Bill."

Do ghosts ever gnash their teeth?

GRANDMA PUT HER FOOT DOWN

By Victor A. Croley

THE FIRST settlers in the Ozarks were hunters. Black bear were plentiful in the hills and provided a cash crop. Their heavy pelts found a ready market; the hams were salted for food; and bear grease, a staple commodity in New Orleans, was used for cooking, lubrication, medicines and even pomades and cosmetics.

At first there was little interest in ownership of the vast public lands. A man simply found a site that pleased him and built a rough log shelter for himself and his dogs. If the hunting were good, and other conditions favored it, the married hunters would bring their families and plan a permanent settlement. But the pioneer wife knew her man and knew that a permanent home was unlikely. Often she would just get her lilac bush planted by the doorstep, a little garden patch worked up for corn, beans and pumpkins, when the man of the house would decide the bears had been killed off or the neighbors were getting too close. Better times lay beyond the mountain, and there was nothing to do but follow. She was the chattel of her lord and master, raised on Bible teachings, and could say with Ruth, "Whither thou goest, I will go."

By the time of the second and third generations, their sons and grandsons were farmers first and hunters second. Game still made up a large part of the diet, and no man considered life complete without a pack of hound dogs. Still, small towns had been established and lands were now bought and surveyed and deeds registered with the government. Much of the good bottomland had been taken up and farming was a profitable occupation.

The good wife was still duty-bound to follow her man, but had more possessions to tie them down. She couldn't bundle up everything on a pack horse, put a lead rope on the family cow, and traipse off into the next county. There were farm tools and equipment, household furniture, bedsteads and cupboards and cabinets. After moving became a major operation, there was more thought and discussion about such an undertaking.

Ozark men had inherited a thirst for adventure as well as the wanderlust of their fathers and grandfathers, in spite of the hoe and the plow. The West was unknown Indian territory and a man just naturally had a hankering to learn what was beyond the distant skyline. There were plenty of rumors and wild tales and when word arrived of the discovery of gold in California, there was no holding back the adventurous. Half a dozen men from northwest Arkansas made the long overland journey to the Coast to spy out the country. They reported back not only a land flowing with milk and honey, but criss-crossed by streams rolling with gold nuggets. Nothing would do but they and their neighbors must sell out and form a great caravan for the journey west.

Their enthusiasm was contagious and soon everyone was for it. Everyone except Grandma Baker. As a girl she had made the long and difficult trek over the hills from Tennessee, and the hardships of that journey were enough for one lifetime. Besides, at her age, she didn't know what she would do with a lot of gold if she had it.

"Arkansas is plenty good enough for me, and Arkansas is where I am going to stay," she declared. And when Grandma laid down the law, that was it. Grandpa knew right then that he was going to have to travel without her.

THE PARTY was all winter long getting ready for they were not footloose and shiftless border drifters but well-to-do farmers and it was no easy task to sell their land and other property they couldn't take with them. Their wagons and equipment were of the best. Their livestock included the finest on the frontier, among them a big stallion valued at $2,000.

All told, nearly 150 people assembled at the big spring on Crooked Creek, about four miles south of Harrison. Captain Alexander Fancher, affectionately known at "Piney Alex," was chosen as their leader and he set the starting day for the caravan as May 1, 1857.

At the last minute, John S. Baker came down with erysipelas and was too sick to travel, so they started off without him and hoped he and his small party might catch up later. There was hardly a dry eye at the parting, and Grandma Baker felt an awful emptiness inside. Somehow she knew the train was headed for disaster—that she would never see her loved ones again—but she bravely held back her fears and forebodings and waved them out of sight. A few days later when John's party set out, it was just about more than she could take. He was still weak and pale from his ailment, but grimly determined to drive as hard as possible, hoping to join up with the larger party before they reached the dangerous Indian country. Grandma wouldn't let him go without one last gift. She made John go into the root cellar and fetch out her sovereign remedy for weakness and ill health, a ten-gallon keg of her famous peach brandy.

There were only three wagons in this second party. Besides John Baker, his wife and two small children, there was John's uncle, Dal Weaver, and Dal's brother, Pink. There were also three young men named Smith, who were traveling with their aged mother.

The little group drove hard and put in long hours each day, but the caravan knives. Clay won the battle, whereupon, according to agreement, he climbed out of the grave, filled it up, rounded it off nicely, bowed his head in a word of prayer for the deceased, then mounted his horse and went on his way. That was Clay Allison's story, according to the old-timers around Pecos, and as he was the only witness and was not around to question the testifiers, there was no one to dispute the story.

Another legend purports to relate the facts about the effort of a sheriff at Las Vegas, New Mexico, to arrest Clay on a warrant charging some infraction of the law. According to the story, the sheriff, with the warrant in his pocket, got in his buggy and drove out from Las Vegas to a place where Clay Allison was camped. Clay evidently saw him coming, for he rode toward him on his horse. The sheriff sat in his buggy and read the warrant to Clay, who listened attentively.

When the sheriff told him he was under arrest, Clay said, "Okay," and started riding along at a slow place, the sheriff following him in his buggy. A mile or two before they reached Las Vegas, a skunk crossed the road in front of Clay. He pulled his gun and killed it, got off his horse, picked up the dead skunk, walked to the buggy and disarmed the sheriff.

He cut off a piece of saddle string and tied one end of it around the animal's neck and the other to its feet, and hung it around the sheriff's neck. Under Clay's orders, the sheriff drove around the square with Clay following behind, shouting, "Look, fellows, the sheriff's got me under arrest!" After circling the square, Clay waved to the spectators, put the steel to his horse, and loped out of town.

Runner by name, had a camp something like six or eight miles distant from the camp of Pete Owl Child. When the soldiers reached the camp of Chief Heavy Runner, this Chief went toward them as if to tell them who he was and explain his mission there, but the soldiers opened fire and I myself counted two hundred and seventeen dead bodies after the firing,—Chief Heavy Runner was shot and killed during this firing. The able-bodied Indians at that time were out hunting and those who were killed were the Chief and such Indians as could not hunt, being the old men, women and children. The Indians did not return the fire of the soldiers. Only one shot was fired by any of the Indians, and this was after the general firing had ceased when one of the soldiers rode through the camp and shot everything and every person that was alive if he saw they had been injured. The soldier opened the flap of one of the tents and after shooting inside started to ride away when an Indian inside the tent drew his gun on this soldier and shot him in the back of the head or neck and knocked him from his horse. This was the only shot fired by any of the Indians.

After the firing was over, the soldiers gathered up the bedding, clothing and subsistence, and piled them up with a lot of wood and set fire to the pile and burned everything up.

The soldiers then rounded up something like five thousand head of horses belonging to the Indians, among which were some four or five hundred head of horses belonging to Chief Heavy Runner, and drove these horses off.

Pete Owl Child got away from his camp, and the soldiers returned to Fort Shaw without making his arrest.

At the time Chief Heavy Runner was shot and killed I was distant from him, probably fifty or sixty yards. After the Chief fell, some of the soldiers came to his body and went through his pockets, taking papers of recommendation, etcetera. At that time, the manner of burial among the Indians was to place the dead bodies in trees. The soldiers, however, on reading the papers taken from the dead body of Chief Heavy Runner, dug a grave and he was buried in the ground.

(Signed) JOSEPH KIPP.

BAKER'S butchery of the Piegans on the Marias River far surpassed the demonstration by the military at Sand Creek or Wounded Knee. Joe Kipp didn't relate in this 1913 statement the condition of Baker relative to sobriety, nor did he mention the indisputable fact that from the very onset of the campaign, Kipp tried in vain to convince Baker that he was attacking the wrong village. Baker became so impatient with Kipp's insistence that he assigned two troopers to ride directly behind the scout and shoot to kill if Kipp made any attempt to warn Heavy Runner's camp. The whole truth of the Baker episode is not a pretty tale and is indeed a disgrace in our military history.

There is a marked discrepancy in the number of horses involved. The military report made by Baker indicates that the pony herd was captured but places the number of horses at 300; and about half of these, frenzied from the gunfire, escaped. Kipp's estimate of 5,000 head of horses appears quite unusual for a settlement of not more than 300 Indians.

Following the regrettable incident on the Marias, young Joe returned to Fort Shaw and immediately resigned his position as scout and interpreter. Nevertheless, it was several years before he regained the trust of the Blackfeet people because of his part, innocent as it was, in the slaughter of Heavy Runner's band. Later, Joe Kipp was to adopt two of the Chief's orphaned children and rear them as his own.

Shortly after the Marias incident Kipp again teamed up with Charley Thomas. The two enterprising young men decided to go into business for themselves. It is quite apparent that neither had any misgivings about trading whiskey for furs. A trader operating without a supply of red-eye brought in few hides. Joe's idea was to set up a post which would attract the Blackfeet and Assiniboines to a place in central Montana near the Canadian line—preferably just a bit north of the vague border. That way he and Charley could circumvent the United States Territorial Law which forbade bartering with the Indians with whiskey as the stock-in-trade. Up until the time of the Baker affair, this law was taken lightly; afterward, and following acts of aggression against the settlers, Marshal Harding was instructed to enforce the laws of the Territory at all costs.

This presented a problem for the young partners. It was absolutely necessary to obtain an initial supply of red-eye and there was no Canadian source. Kipp formulated a plan to bring several hogsheads from Helena, M. T. Joe made the purchase in the busy mining center and loaded it on a raft. The plan was to float the illicit cargo downriver on the Missouri to the mouth of Sun River. Here Charley Thomas would meet him and transport the barrels northward to the proposed site of the post by wagon and team.

SHORTLY AFTER Joe left Helena, U. S. Marshal Harding got word of the out-sized purchase and set out to confiscate the load. It was nip and tuck. Joe had fair sailing down the smooth-flowing river and the marshal pursued on horseback a few miles behind. The lawman began to close the gap. It became necessary for Joe to beach the raft in a large stand of brush on the ranch of a friend. The rancher soon was approached by the representative of the law. Harding asked if he had seen Joe Kipp go by with a load of whiskey. The rancher truthfully replied that Kipp had not gone past. Perplexed, Marshal Harding figured that Joe had eluded him, and departed for Fort Benton. He again took to the trail. As soon as the coast was clear, Joe continued on to his meeting with Thomas and they began the 100-mile northward journey to the boundary.

In some manner, Marshal Harding discovered he had been duped and once again picked up Joe's trail. After hours of hard riding the lawman overtook the slower moving wagon and halted the suspects. A verbal battle between the officers and Joe ensued. The marshal was determined to make an arrest and Joe insisted that the entourage was halted several hundred yards north of the boundary and that the marshal had no authority on Canadian soil. Kipp finally convinced the officer, who returned homeward. It was later determined that the halting place was well inside the United States.

Kipp, wanting to be sure his new enterprise was on safe ground, moved several miles to the north before building his post. In honor of his victory over the marshal, the little post was christened Fort Stand-Off. The community of Stand Off, Alberta, just a few miles south and west of present-day Lethbridge on the Belly River is built at the site of the old trading post.

FRONT VIEW OF FORT BENTON

Kipp and Thomas prospered and Fort Stand-Off was the first of several remote stores established by the new firm.

In 1878 Kipp purchased Fort Conrad from the firm of Isaac G. Baker of Fort Benton. The fort, primarily a trading post, was described as being two rows of sturdy log cabins connected and joined across the west end by stables and a horse corral. It was located at the ford near the juncture of the Dry Fork of the Marias and the mainstream of that river.

Famed author and Indian historian, James Willard Schultz, was employed as a clerk in the Fort Conrad store, and he and Kipp developed a strong friendship which was to last until Joe's last day on earth. Schultz's great admiration for Kipp is manifested in passages in several of his books about the Blackfeet Nation. Today, nothing remains of Fort Conrad. Kipp sold the post to the firm of Connelly and McDevitt in 1880.

There were many other Joe Kipp enterprises and he prospered. He built a trading store at the almost forgotten town of Robare on Birch Creek in what is now Pondera County, Montana. He had a store on Lower Badger Creek and in the summer of 1880 built a trading post thirty miles above the mouth of the Musselshell River about eighty miles east of present day Lewistown, Montana. From this post he operated several portable trading camps which could be moved from place to place to follow the rovings of the Indian hunters. Accommodating, you can bet your shirt—but it was Joe Kipp who was picking off the choice furs and hides for shipment to the East. In his later years Kipp was to own a hotel, general store and sawmill in Browning, Montana.

DUE TO lack of transcontinental transportation in Canada it was difficult for the Crown to get the payroll money to soldiers and employes of the garrisons in Alberta. The situation was remedied by sending the money from St. Louis to Fort Benton by river steamer. From there to the remote outposts north of the boundary, it was Joe Kipp, riding alone, who delivered the Canadian payrolls. Although he made the trip countless times over a period of several years, Joe was never molested nor was he ever a dollar short.

A hilarious incident occurred during the furnishing of Joe Kipp's Browning store. It was an absolute necessity for any trading post or fort to have, in good working condition, a grinding wheel which the Indian hunters and traders could use to sharpen their knives, scrapers and hatchets. The tribesmen had learned to expect this courtesy along with the free pipe of tobacco and half-cup of whiskey when they came to barter. For some reason, while Kipp was setting up the store, the grindstone (going price about $3) was overlooked. In addition, more supplies were needed and Joe was too busy to leave. He decided to kill two birds and add a grindstone.

After preparing a list of the necessary items he selected a friend and associate, Hi Upham, to make the river journey to St. Louis to obtain the stock. Kipp provided Upham with a $10,000 letter of credit and impressed upon him the importance of the $3 wheel. Now Hi Upham was a young man of the frontier—honest and usually dependable—but he had never been to the "big city." Evidently it was quite an experience. The trip was of several weeks' duration and an anxious Joe Kipp was waiting on the dock at Fort Benton when Hi's steamer pulled ashore. Standing on the deck, smiling broadly and pointing to a shiny new grinder, was Hi. As the cargo was unloaded Kipp was dismayed to discover that there was nothing for him. Questioning young Upham, Kipp determined that the lad had completely forgotten the merchandise order, the letter of credit, and everything else except the all-important wheel. The trip had cost Joe several hundred dollars—for a $3 piece of equipment. Competitors and friends alike came to the Browning store to laugh and to see Joe Kipp's $10,000 grinding wheel.

Kipp later sold the Browning store to W. C. "Bill" Broadwater and after a long and varied career began to slow down. He was everyone's friend. The large house at his ranch south of Blackfoot, Montana was seldom used except when entertaining guests. The yard around the structure was constantly filled with the tepees and skin lodges of his friends and those he was supporting. At his sawmill operation, employes were fed "on the boss" and were summoned to the noon meal by the ringing of a large bell. The clamor it created served to inform others that food was ready, and it is said that the workers' chow-line contained nearly ten times as many men as were on the payroll. Yet none ever went away hungry.

There is little doubt that between 1890 and 1913, Joe Kipp, Kipah, or as some of the Blackfeet called him, "Raven Quiver," was the true chief of the Blackfeet Nation. The blood chiefs and the tribal council consulted him on all matters of importance and he guided them well. The major portion of the fortune he had accumulated went to benefit his Indian friends. All through his life Kipp retained a great pride in his heritage. He was profoundly proud of his Indian blood and any desultory remarks made in his presence regarding "breed" or halfbreed would rapidly fire his Scotch and Indian temper.

Joseph Kipp, after a brief and sudden illness, died of pneumonia at Browning, Montana, on December 12, 1913 at the age of sixty-six. His passing to the "Sand Hills" was mourned by hundreds.

Today, there is a Montana State Park in the Charles M. Russell National Wildlife Refuge north of Lewistown, Montana which commemorates his father's name. The Canadian towns of Kipp and Stand Off in Alberta are a tribute to Joe's memory. A lake near his Blackfoot, Montana home also bears his name.

"The Merchant Prince of the Upper Missouri" was quite a man.

ahead was also pushing as hard as it could. Piney Alex knew the dangers and knew the importance of speed. He had no fear of Indians or outlaws with a party as strong as his, but he did know the terrible story of the Donner party which had been trapped in the snows of the Sierra some years before. He did not want to risk a similar fate.

The John Baker party was unable to close the gap, although on several occasions they found the camping places of the party ahead, with the ashes of their fires still warm. When word of the slaughter of their friends and relatives in the infamous Mountain Meadows Massacre reached them, John was just two days behind. Failure to catch up had saved his and his family's lives for the moment, but they were still in grave danger. They tried to turn aside and avoid the valley of death, but it was too late. A war party of Indians found them and before the wagons could be turned into a defensive corral, shots rang out and a shower of arrows fell. It isn't known whether these were Indians who had taken part in the massacre, or whether it was an entirely new band.

AT THE first volley, Dal Weaver and one of his sisters were killed. One of the Smith brothers leaped on a saddle horse and tried to dash off for help but the Indians lassoed him and dragged him to death. In the excitement one of the teams got frightened and ran away with a wagon. The Indians took after it, sure of their ability to return and slaughter the emigrants at will. But when the runaways were finally stopped and the wagon stripped, it was found to be the one carrying Grandma's keg of peach brandy—enough to make the entire band of Indians drunk.

In a silly stupor, they still tried to close in on the surviving emigrants but just as they were about to do so, the men ripped open all the feather beds they had and threw the feathers into the faces of the Indians. Before the flustered and intoxicated attackers could figure out what was happening, the adults had gathered up the small children and sprinted for the shelter of a nearby thicket. The two surviving Smith brothers made a cross-cradle of hands and wrists and, with their old mother seated between them, they carried her to safety. The Indians were too drunk by then to follow or to care and contented themselves with pillaging and burning the wagons.

Pink Weaver hurried ahead down the trail as fast as he could go looking for help. He finally found some of the soldiers who were going to Utah Territory.

When these soldiers reached the terrified survivors most of them were so weak from fright and their exertions they could hardly walk another step. They were eventually taken to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, where they were cared for until they were strong enough to return to Arkansas.

For a long time afterward, Grandma Baker thought these few survivors were the only family she had left, but a few years later Captain James Lynch and some of his men, sent to investigate the massacre, disguised themselves and won the confidence of Mormon families. They learned that seventeen children, ranging in age from a few months to seven years at the time of the slaughter, had been spared and were being cared for in Mormon homes. He was able to recover these children and return them to Arkansas. Among them were the three youngest children of George Baker—Grandma's grandchildren!

BANK ROBBERY—CALIFORNIA STYLE

By Rudell Murray Norris

SWEAT ROLLED down the face of James McCarthy as he dug holes on the hillside and thought about robbing a bank—plans which were the start of one of the most ludicrous episodes in Ventura County history.

The balmy Southern California weather in early April, 1889, was just made for camping out under the big oaks which dotted the hills a few miles east of the sleepy village of Ventura. But it was hot when you were digging holes. McCarthy paused a moment, wiped his brow, and went over his strategy for holding up the Collins and Sons Bank on Ventura's Main Street.

It was here under these sheltering trees that he was stashing his supplies so he could hide out while the posse was looking for him. He still had to go to town, buy a gun, and rent a fast horse that would keep him ahead of Sheriff A. J. Snodgrass and his posse.

McCarthy knew that J. E. Collins went to lunch each day at noon, leaving only the teller in the bank. This would be the best time for a robbery.

On April 25, McCarthy, mounted on his rented horse, cantered slowly down Main Street to the intersection of California Street. He estimated it was shortly after noon, and dismounted. Someone had left a horse and rig standing in front of the bank's hitching rack, so McCarthy merely tied his horse to the rear wheel of the wagon. He wasn't going to be gone very long.

Inside the bank, McCarthy could see the teller, Jack Morrison, counting coins into a tray. A stack of folding money was piled in front of it. There was no one else in sight.

McCarthy stepped up to the teller and set a neatly wrapped package on the counter.

"There's dynamite in this," he announced as forcefully as he could.

Morrison acted as though he didn't hear and kept on counting his money. McCarthy became a bit flustered. He pulled out his gun and pointed it at the teller.

"I am hungry, penniless and desperate, and I have been contemplating suicide. Give me that money," demanded McCarthy.

Morrison didn't look up. He continued to count his money for a moment, then dropped to the floor and scurried along behind the counter and dashed out the back door.

The bewildered McCarthy felt there was nothing to do but put his package of dynamite in his pocket, pick up the folding money, put it on the tray and walk out to his horse. It was almost too easy as he left the bank with the tray in one hand, the gun in the other.

IN THE MEANTIME, Morrison had reached the alley through the back door of the bank and had dashed through the rear of Dr. Miller's drugstore and then back to Main Street in time to meet McCarthy coming out of the bank.

"He robbed the bank! Arrest him, somebody!" shouted Morrison, jumping up and down.

No one moved. In fact, there was no one on the street except the teller and the bank robber.

It was McCarthy's turn to ignore Morrison as he walked over to his horse. He knew about barking dogs and if the teller had any bite in him, he would have done something before now.

Then McCarthy met his first unexpected problem. Gun in one hand, balancing the money tray in the other, he needed a third hand to untie his horse from the wagon wheel. He didn't have a third hand. He struggled to get close enough to pull the reins loose with his teeth, but Morrison's shouts caused the team to back up. The reins that had been on top of the wheel suddenly were on the bottom, half buried in the dust of the street.

The movement of the wagon frightened the rented horse and it lurched against McCarthy, spilling the money. The robber dropped to his knees and groped in the dirt for the loot.

Morrison's screams finally interrupted a shopkeeper's lunch long enough for the man to walk to the front door of his shop and look out. He listened to Morrison for a moment, then returned inside to rummage through his wares for a gun. At last he found a gun of uncertain vintage and returned outside to find McCarthy still on his hands and knees in the dirt, scooping up the money. Morrison was still excitedly yelling for the bandit's arrest.

Now the shopkeeper had a gun, but he was not quite sure how to use it, or even what to do with it. The hysterical Morrison offered no help to the storeman but continued his marathon of jumping and screaming at the top of his voice.

At this very moment, Sheriff Snodgrass had completed his lunch and was strolling down Main Street on his way back to the jail. He took in the scene in front of the bank, but he knew something the others didn't. The bank robber had a gun, the shopkeeper had a gun, but the sheriff did not. Crime was so rare in Ventura he had never imagined that he would run into a bank robbery during his lunch hour.

AT THE SIGHT of the sheriff, the shopkeeper rushed up to the lawman, waving the revolver and demanding the sheriff do something. The sheriff did. He grabbed the gun from the shopkeeper and promptly demanded McCarthy's surrender.

From his crouched position in the dusty street, McCarthy looked up at the gun. The proximity expanded the size of the barrel until it looked like a small cannon. In pure frustration, McCarthy threw the tray of money, scattering the coins again in the dust. He tossed his gun after it.

"I give up," he sighed. The sheriff bundled the bungling bandit off to jail.

The town's newspaper, the Ventura Democrat, called McCarthy a "BOLD BAD MAN" in headlines the next day. But in the jail, the holdup man was trying to convince everyone he was crazy. He beat his head against the walls and howled like a dog. He talked jibberish to anyone who would listen. He mumbled constantly. He even took newspapers and pretended to try to read them upside down. Within two weeks, the Democrat decided he had "gone out of his mind."

McCarthy's two attorneys told the judge he was insane and the judge agreed. The prisoner was sent to the local asylum where he promptly ceased beating his head against walls, didn't howl, talked normally, and read everything right side up.

His keepers couldn't understand why anyone felt he was unbalanced, so after they got tired of feeding him they turned him loose to roam among the oak-studded hills where he had dug those holes on a spring day not so many months before.

A GREAT WESTERN ARTIST

Clarence Arthur Ellsworth, Artist of the Old West, 1885-1964 was a labor of love by the author, Otha D. Wearin, Iowa farmer, Western buff and collector, former member of Congress, author and Ellsworth's benefactor. It can be bought directly from Otha, at the Nisha Vale Shop, Hastings, Iowa 51590 for $15.00 or, if you're lucky enough to have a bookseller who handles Western art books, from him. Ellsworth was born in Nebraska and lived his first forty-five years on the Great Plains of the U.S. and Canada. He moved to California in 1929 and was for some years connected with various movie studios. Ellsworth was self-taught though he was quick to acknowledge the help of other artists—particularly that of the staff artists on the various newspapers for which he worked in Denver and elsewhere. The author met Ellsworth in California and invited him to spend a summer in the guest cottage on the Nisha Vale Farm in Iowa. Ellsworth became practically a member of the family and returned again and again. He never married and the Wearins and the Oscar (Iron Eyes) Codys of movie and TV fame were his families. Otha got most of the material for the text of this book directly from Clarence while he was at Nisha Vale. Ellsworth was a long-time member of the Los Angeles Corral of The Westerners and contributed illustrations to a number of the annual Brand Books. His pictures and drawings were used in other books and magazines. The author included a bibliographic check list of books illustrated by Ellsworth by Old Bookaroo Jeff Dykes. There is a photo of Clarence as the frontispiece and numerous other photos of him plus reproductions of many of his paintings (six in full color in the text plus one on the dust wrapper), drawings, Christmas cards, illustrated letters, etc. There is an index and the binding is handsome. This is a worthy memorial to a worthy artist-illustrator of the West. Highly recommended and don't wait—there are only 750 numbered and signed copies.

KENTON AND TECUMSEH

The Frontiersman (Little Brown and Co., $8.95) by William W. Eckert is a narrative portraying the lives of two men. Simon Kenton was the hero of the whites during the opening of the Northwest Territory—that vast frontier of the Ohio River Valley. His life and exploits surpassed that of Daniel Boone. Tecumseh, a brilliant Chief of the Shawnee, came close to thwarting the white man's effort to push westward beyond the Colonies. This is a big book depicting the American frontier and the Indians at their best. It is the first book in a series by Eckert entitled "The Winning of America." Previous books of the author include The Great Auk, The Silent Sky, and Wild Season.

A FIGHTING RANGER

I'm Frank Hamer—The Life of a Texas Peace Officer (The Pemberton Press, $7.50) by H. Gordon Frost and John H. Jenkins is a monumental tribute to one of the greatest peace officers of all times and also presents "the true story of Clyde Barrow and Bonnie Parker." Hamer, who participated in nearly 100 gunfights with outlaws, is credited with killing 53 men in the line of duty, was wounded 17 times, and left for dead 4 times. He was described by the press as "a giant of a man . . . and as talkative as an oyster." Hamer, a cowboy, became a horseback Texas Ranger in 1906. He soon gained a wide reputation for his quiet and gentlemanly manners, his complete lack of fear, and his ability to bring the toughest assignments to successful conclusions. Although he often left active duty as a Texas Ranger to fill special assignments, Hamer retained his commission in the Rangers and completed over twenty-six years of active duty, rising to the position of Senior Captain in Austin, the State Capital. In addition he served as peace officer in Navasota, with oil companies, and with a partner in a private security guard association in Houston. He was a bridge between the era of the horseback Ranger and the modern detective backed with scientific tools and procedures. The climax to Hamer's career came when he planned and completed the job of stopping the murderous pair—Clyde Barrow and Bonnie Parker. It took him just 102 days as a special agent for Col. Lee Simmons, head of the Texas Prison System, to track down the killers, lay the final trap, and close out the lives of two of the most cold-blooded killers of all time. Hamer was always reticent about his deeds. He was cooperative but quiet. His friend and confidant, Walter Prescott Webb, said of Hamer in his famous book, The Texas Rangers, "If all criminals in Texas were asked to name the man that they would most dread to have on their trail, they would probably name Captain Frank Hamer without hesitation." Prelude to Massacre

Wynkoop urged that arms and ammunition be issued but the decision in August allowing Wynkoop to use his judgment on supplies came too late. A band of Cheyennes and Arapahoes, feeling the treaty had been broken by the government, had decided to go north and war against their traditional enemies, the Pawnees.

When a group of them approached a settlement for supplies, two Indians carried away a white woman. Other Indians in the camp made them return her but the damage had been done. Wynkoop, when he learned of the incident, called in Little Rock and reminded him that under the Medicine Lodge Treaty the Indians had to deliver the two for trial.

Before Little Rock's warriors could locate the band a group of vigilantes did. Now the Indians were convinced the treaty had been scrapped. By October, after other groups of whites and Indians had joined the conflict, an estimated 100 whites had been killed.

Gen. Alfred A. Sully, with several troops of the Seventh Cavalry and detachments of the Third Infantry, began a campaign to drive the hostile bands out of Kansas.

He overtook the Indians along the Cimarron and, in two days of skirmishing, lost one man killed, one wounded and one captured. At Beaver Creek Sully turned back. The Indians followed until he made camp on Bluff Creek.

Such was the climate of emotion on the Southern Plains as Black Kettle, Little Raven and other chiefs moved their bands into winter camp along the Washita and Generals Sherman and Sheridan prepared a campaign to subjugate the Indians.

THE MAIN expedition of the campaign was to be under the command of Sheridan and would include a regiment of Kansas Volunteers and the Seventh Cavalry. The Kansas Volunteers officially were the 19th Kansas Volunteer Cavalry, authorized in mid-October to serve six months.

Sheridan wanted Custer to command the Seventh Cavalry but Custer was under suspension. Sherman and Sheridan appealed to Washington to lift the suspension. They also notified Custer, on September 28, 1868, at his home in Monroe, Michigan. Custer was on a train west on the 29th.

Within a few hours after he reported to his command on Bluff Creek, some of the Indians who had followed Sully to the area attacked the camp. Although hundreds of shots were fired, no Indian casualties were claimed by Custer in his memoirs.

During the next two weeks Custer trained his troops, awaiting orders to move out. A site for a supply camp had been chosen at the juncture of Beaver Creek and Wolf Creek, which became Camp Supply. Custer made an uneventful march to the camp, crossing one Indian trail but seeing no sign of the enemy.

Two companies of Kansas Volunteers escorted Sheridan's staff to Camp Supply while the other ten companies, under Col. S. J. Crawford, who resigned as governor of Kansas to accept the command, were to go to Camp Supply from Topeka. Crawford's column was met at the Cimarron by an early blizzard. Eventually the Kansans reached Camp Supply but not without hardship.

In the autumn of 1868 Black Kettle moved his band into winter camp at a bend in the Washita. He placed his lodge at the western edge of the village. Two miles downstream was the camp of Little Raven's Arapahoes. Farther below were the Cheyenne band of Little Rock, the Medicine Arrow Cheyennes and a few Apaches and Comanches.

ON THE NIGHT of November 26, Black Kettle made plans to move his band farther downstream. Reports that a new army was being formed in Kansas brought memories of Sand Creek.

That day Black Kettle had returned to the camp after visiting with Gen. William Babcock Hazen, the Indian agent at Fort Cobb, who had become a trusted friend of the Indians along the Washita. Hazen had told Black Kettle that a campaign was being organized by Sheridan to punish the Indians for the raids in Kansas.

Hazen assured Black Kettle that he would do what he could to protect the Indians along the Washita but pointed out he had no power to make peace for this new campaign.

Snow was falling when Black Kettle left Fort Cobb and became heavier as he and his Cheyennes traveled the eighty miles to their village. It was near nightfall when Black Kettle called the leaders to his lodge to tell them they must move downstream the next morning to be nearer the other Indians. Soon the entire camp had heard the advice from General Hazen. Fires burned late that night as families prepared for an early start the next day.

On November 22, Crawford's volunteers still had not arrived. Custer received orders from Sheridan to leave the next day on a thirty-day scout. Later, according to Sheridan's plan, when the Kansas units had arrived and were ready to travel again, Sheridan would follow, meeting Custer in the Fort Cobb area.

The next morning snow was knee deep and still falling as Custer left Camp Supply. Following a course along Wolf Creek to a point north of Antelope Hills, the troops battled the deep drifts in the creek valley for three days before reaching the point where they were to turn south and cross the Canadian River.

While the supply wagons were being worked across the broad channel of the Canadian, Custer sent Major Elliott out with a scouting party. An Indian trail was found twelve miles upstream, leading in a southwesterly direction. Since it seemed fresh, Elliott notified Custer, who sent back orders to follow the trail. Custer, with his main force, would cut south to intercept it.

Leaving a guard with the wagons, Custer headed for the rendezvous. When he reached the trail, the tracks showed Elliott already had passed. Finally Custer overtook Elliott where the scouting party had camped to await the main column.

Custer decided to move forward and, if possible, find the destination of the Indians that night. After several hours the scouts heard the barking of dogs. Three scouts were sent out and determined the location of the village.

Now the battle plan was set. Custer would surround the village before daybreak. At a signal, the lines of troops would converge on the Indians. Elliott was sent with three troops (G, H and M) to a point downstream from the village. When he had his men in position, Elliott had some dismount while others were kept mounted to chase down any Indians who made it through the walking line.

Colonel Thompson led two troops (B and F) upstream from the village, crossed the Washita and swung in to attack from behind. Between Custer's force, attacking from the northwest, and Thompson's units were two troops (E and I) commanded by Colonel Myers, who crossed the stream with Thompson but pulled up along the riverbank.

Four troops (A, C, D and K), Col. W. W. Cook's forty sharpshooters, and white and Osage scouts made up Custer's force.

IN THE Indian village, Black Kettle was among the early risers. The quiet of the valley was broken by the scream of a squaw who had spotted the advancing soldiers.

According to Indian reports, Black Kettle fired one shot to awaken the late sleepers. Almost at that instant a bugle sounded in the timber across the river and a band started playing. Custer, always the showman, had brought the regimental band with him. Now it played "Garry Owen."

As Black Kettle and his squaw swung to the back of his pony and headed for the river, Custer's cavalry, with Custer in the lead, burst out of the timber only a few yards away on the other bank of the Washita.

Two shots hit Black Kettle and he slid into the icy waters of the river. The survivor of Sand Creek and leader at Medicine Lodge Creek was the first victim of the Battle of the Washita. His squaw fell dead a few feet away.

Custer's men raced across the ford. Few of the Indians had time to grab their weapons. Flight was their only hope.

Casualties suffered by the Custer force do not bear out his claim that the attack was met by a spirited resistance. In the attack on the village the only losses were Capt. L. M. Hamilton killed and eleven men wounded. (Captain Hamilton's only wound was in his back. The grandson of Alexander Hamilton was riding next to Custer and fell in the initial charge, before the Indians really started returning the fire.)

As to the Indian casualties, Custer returned to Camp Supply with fifty-three prisoners, all women and children. Reports indicate eleven of them were wounded. Custer reported 103 warriors slain. An Indian report to the Secretary of the Interior later showed thirteen men (including two chiefs, Black Kettle and Little Rock), sixteen women and nine children killed, a total of thirty-eight Indians slain.

The initial victory over Black Kettle's village was only part of the action that day. Elliott's troops were moving through the brush toward the village when Elliott and a few of his mounted men gave chase to a group of Indians escaping from the main force. Young warriors in the group ran for a ridge. Leaving Sgt. Maj. Walter Kennedy to guard the captured women and children, Elliott led the others after the youths and killed them.

Kennedy probably was the first to see the warriors arriving from Little Raven's village—and the first to be killed by them. When Elliott turned back toward the stream he likely saw Kennedy being pulled from his horse and slain.

Other warriors were coming along both sides of the Washita. Some rode out to meet Elliott and his seventeen men, according to later Indian reports. Elliott led his men to a bend in what was to become Sergeant Major Creek, named for Kennedy, and prepared to make a stand. It did not last long, for more and more warriors arrived from the other villages.

While Elliott and his men were fighting their fatal battle, Custer was searching the village for arms, ammunition and provisions, and rounding up squaws and children hiding in the lodges.

Then Custer was under attack, warriors appearing on the ridges around the village where only a few hours earlier the Seventh Cavalry had waited for its charge into the camp. By noon, which would coincide with Indian reports as the time of the final assault on Elliott's position, the horde of warriors had increased to a point where the troops were being harassed continually from all sides. Custer was surrounded.

From the prisoners he learned the source of the warriors and realized the nature of his position. Adding to Custer's problems was diminished ammunition, which had been used indiscriminately during the attack. Most of the soldiers had few of the 100 rounds they had taken into battle that morning.

Fortune, however, was with Custer. A wagon and cavalry guard came into the village, following the route Custer had taken in the initial attack. Quartermaster Bell, after getting the supply wagons across the Canadian, had loaded a wagon with ammunition and, with twenty-five troopers, had set out along Custer's trail. Bell's wild dash through the circle of warriors brought the wagon in before the startled Indians could fire on it.

Custer returned to the destruction of the village and the shooting of 875 Indian ponies. After all the Indian provisions had been burned, Custer began reorganizing his force.

Reports later indicated Custer had intended to move against the other villages but had been persuaded to abandon the plan by Ben Clark, identified by many as chief scout although Custer in his memoirs gave that title to California Joe. Since the troops and horses were exhausted, it was decided to make temporary camp in the village and fight off the attacking warriors.

At dusk the bugle sounded. The column formed and moved out downstream, then reversed direction and began the retreat to Camp Supply. The ruse worked. Apparently the Indians from the other villages, seeing the troops moving downstream, had rushed back to set about defending or abandoning their own lodges.

Custer kept moving until morning, when the column met the wagontrain. After a brief rest, the march was resumed.

When the attack on the village had started, the cavalrymen had left their overcoats piled where they had waited for dawn. Arapaho warriors had found the coats, and the white men made the long march with little protection against the cold.

As the column neared Camp Supply, Custer sent messengers ahead, suggesting that Sheridan and his staff grant the triumphant Seventh Cavalry the honor of a formal review.

With his Osage scouts in fresh warpaint and the band playing, Custer's tired troops passed in review on December 2, just nine days after they had left on what was to have been a thirty-day scout.

WHILE the prisoners were being settled and the troops pitched camp, Custer reported to Sheridan to expand on the written report he had dispatched after the battle.

The report had stated, "Two officers, Major Elliott and Captain Hamilton, were killed, and 19 enlisted men." Custer had returned with only the body of Hamilton. Sheridan's inquiries as to Elliott brought an acknowledgment from Custer that he had no definite information on Elliott's fate.

Custer said one of the scouts had reported seeing Elliott and several soldiers chasing some Indians below the village. Custer said he had sent parties to search for Elliott but after going nearly two miles downstream (which would have taken them to Little Raven's village) they had found no sign of Elliott. Sheridan then decided to begin a search for Elliott as soon as Custer's men were rested.

It was at this time that Custer began his relationship with Monahseetah, daughter of Little Rock. The Indian girl ostensibly was an interpreter, although Custer in his memoirs indicated he had a passable knowledge of Cheyenne, and Monahseetah apparently did not speak English. Monahseetah was not returned to the other prisoners in the Fort Hays stockade until the spring of 1869 when Mrs. Custer joined her husband. Several sources, including the prisoners, tell of the birth of a son to Monahseetah during the summer. She called the blonde papoose "Yellow Swallow."

Custer and Sheridan had set out to clear the Washita of hostiles. Now, while Custer's men rested at Camp Supply, the goal virtually was reached.

Satank, Satanta and Lone Wolf decided to move their Kiowas to the Fort Cobb area where they would have the protection of Agent Hazen and his force of one company of infantry and one troop of cavalry. With these Kiowas went some Arapahoes and Comanches.

Other Kiowas, under Kicking Bird and Woman's Heart, decided to move to the Wichita Mountains where they would have better positions if Custer returned. Arrow Point's Comanches joined them.

Heading for the plains north of the Wichitas were Arapaho bands led by Little Raven, Yellow Bear, Powder Face and Left Hand, and Cheyennes led by Little Robe and the Medicine Arrow band.

WHEN Custer and Sheridan reached the scene of the Washita fight, parties were sent out to find any clues to Elliott's fate. The first body found was that of Kennedy. Farther along the creek they located the spot where Elliott had made his stand. The bodies of Elliott and his men bristled with arrows.

The enlisted men were buried on the north side of the Washita with a single marker. The body of Elliott was sent to Fort Arbuckle.

Custer and Sheridan resumed the march down the Washita, finding only empty village sites. Finally the column, which included the Seventh Cavalry, scouts, 10 companies of Kansas Volunteers and 300 wagons hauling supplies for the 2,000 men, reached Fort Cobb. There Custer and Sheridan talked with Hazen and with Satanta and Lone Wolf, who had been seized as hostages. As a result, two bands of Kiowas surrendered, at the bidding of their prisoner chiefs.

The other tribes had had enough of trying to walk the white man's road. Sheridan selected a site for a base suitable for the long campaign he expected. Just east of the Wichita Mountains on Cache Creek, work was started on Fort Sill. Cavalry and infantry units commanded by Col. A. W. Evans, who had left Fort Bascom in New Mexico to join Sheridan's campaign, arrived at the site of the new fort.

A short time later Custer learned that many of the Arapahoes and Cheyennes had moved to the Palo Duro area of the Texas Panhandle.

Little Robe of the Cheyennes and Little Raven of the Arapahoes sent word they wanted to negotiate. Little Robe and Yellow Bear, representing Little Raven, came in to talk. They agreed to take Custer and a detachment to Little Raven's village on Mulberry Creek. The Arapahoes, agreeing to make peace, set out toward Fort Sill. Custer stayed at the site while Little Robe rode farther west to tell his Cheyennes to come in. Custer waited in vain and returned to Fort Sill empty-handed.

Work had progressed on the new fort and in February the Tenth Cavalry, a Negro unit organized in 1866 at the same time as the Seventh Cavalry, was assigned to the garrison.

On March 2, 1869, Custer set out with his cavalry and the Kansans to find the Indians in the Texas Panhandle. Time, weather and campaigning had been hard on the mounts and now all that were serviceable were assigned to the Seventh, the Volunteers being converted to infantry.

After two weeks Custer sent the footsore Kansas units to the Black Kettle site on the Washita to rest while the Seventh continued the search. A week later Custer found Little Robe's Cheyennes camped on Sweetwater Creek. After negotiations, which included Custer's taking the Sacred Arrow vow in a pledge of peace, he seized four hostages —all old men. The chiefs he had sought escaped the trap.

Failing to get the Indians to surrender, Custer returned to Camp Supply. The cavalry had covered many miles but combat was only a matter of hours. The Kansas Volunteers were mustered out. The campaign was over.

On June 25, 1876, the Indians found their revenge along the Little Big Horn.

Author's note: The Cheyenne and Arapaho country of western Oklahoma was opened to white settlement April 19, 1892. On that day the town of Cheyenne was born. The new white settlers found a marker a few miles from Cheyenne. It was a native stone, the carving crude.

"7th Cav. Nov. 27, 1868"

The new town of Cheyenne became known as "the site of the Battle of the Washita." The marker was left at the original location until 1920 when it was brought into town for safekeeping and periodic display.

In January of 1958 work was started on the Black Kettle Museum where the stone marker and other relics of the battle could be preserved and displayed. The museum was opened March 15, 1959.

On display, in addition to the historic stone, are cavalry bits and mess kettles and other items found at the battle site.

Besides articles picked up with the skeleton of Black Kettle when it was found many years after the battle, there are twenty exhibits of Cheyenne relics including a bed protector, ceremonial fan, dress, saddle, moccasins, knife case, arrows and many examples of beadwork.

Two rifles on display are of special interest. One is a Spencer carbine which was used by the cavalry in the Battle of the Washita. The other is a Springfield carbine used by a trooper at the Little Big Horn. Also on display is the Regimental Roster of the Seventh Cavalry for the months of November and December of 1868 and January, February and March of 1869—the period of Custer's campaign on the Washita.

Adding to the items directly relating to the Battle of the Washita is a fine display of frontier relics. A recent addition to the museum is a diorama of the battle by H. W. Klippell.

At a three-acre monument site overlooking the river valley where the battle was fought there is a large stone marker which gives a brief account of the battle and bears the likenesses of Black Kettle and Custer. A plaque designates the site as a National Historic Landmark.

Secretary of the Interior Stewart Udall visited the site in October of 1965 a week after the designation ceremonies to consider possible national park status for the battlefield. The museum is operated by the Oklahoma Industrial Development and Park Department.

ever we had extra, and say hello to my mother. (Always walked in those days for short trips of two, three, four miles.) Sometimes we had surplus eggs because we was a small family. Most folks had enough mouths that they ate up all the eggs their hens laid, and if the hens laid too many they begun to kill off the old hens, as well as the young roosters, for eating purposes. Often we had extra butter I sold to Mr. McNemeer, and once in a while a cowhide which he resold to the tannery at Yam Hill. He paid nine, ten up to twenty cents a pound for the butter, and bought eggs at anywhere from five to eleven cents a dozen—fifty cents for the hide.

I had other chores to do—clean the barn every day, help in the garden, weeding or hoeing or planting, help to pick berries and cherries and apples when they turned ripe, collect eggs, keep the wood box full, drive the yoke of oxen when Mr. Washburn was clearing off land, and help some in harvesting, haying and butchering. We was always making or repairing something—another shed, or patching the barn, or enlarging the smokehouse, or building a sled. I learned about carpentry right there on that place, and about taking care of tools. It always served me in good stead.

THERE WAS plenty to do around the kitchen. Like putting up berries. In berry season all hands would lay off whatever wasn't absolutely necessary and go out into the woods to pick berries. It was a kind of lark that everybody enjoyed and them woods was just full of most every kind of blackberries, raspberries, huckleberries, salmon berries, thimble berries. We'd come home with washtubfuls in the back of the wagon. Then they had to be cleaned and put up in jars and laid away in the storage cellar, which was just dirt with shelves, where butter, milk, eggs, cheese and such was stored.

Vegetables mostly was kept out-of-doors. Folks had a mighty good way for preserving vegetables. First you sprinkled several inches of straw along the ground, maybe twenty-thirty feet long and three feet wide, smaller or larger area depending on the size family you was taking account of. Usually this storage place was built convenient to the kitchen door, not many feet behind the house.

On top of the straw you laid first the potatoes, then cabbages and apples, and other vegetables like beets and carrots. Then another layer of straw on top of the vegetables. Along each side you dug a trench, which was both for drainage and for the dirt you dug up, which you heaped on the top layer of straw. When you got through, it looked like just a big ridge of dirt maybe three feet high. Over all this you built a shed of rafters and siding to shed the rain. Stored this way those vegetables kept just fine all winter. You started in eating by digging out one end, and kept right on through till you'd eat to the other end.

Everybody had kegs of cider and barrels of sauerkraut. Cider you made in hand presses—throw in apples, run a crank to cut them up, then press them down to squeeze out the juice, and put into fifty-gallon kegs and store in your storage cellar. Sauerkraut you made by cutting up cabbage and salting it in barrels.

There was all sorts of ways of keeping meat, and farmers practiced all of them. Most had a smokehouse, where meat was really smoked, not just fixed with a little artificial flavoring the way it is now. You hung your meat up in your smokehouse, beef or pork or salmon mostly, and you built a fire of green hardwood right on the ground and kept it going twenty-four hours a day for maybe a couple of weeks.

Dry-salting was used a lot. Cut up your meat and cover it layer by layer with salt in a box and just leave it there till you was ready to use it. Pork was pickled in barrels and kept in the storage cellar. You put enough water in a barrel, and then add rock salt until you got it strong enough to float an egg. You cut up your pork and put it in the barrel and that's all there was to it, simple as that. It'd keep as long as smoked meat. I've eaten salt pork over a year old and perfectly good meat.

Some made corn beef. You put your beef into brine about the same as salt pork, only with saltpeter added to give the meat its red color. After about a month you take the meat out and boil it to render out the fat, cut it into small pieces, and put it down in new brine.

Nobody ever heard of store-bought bread, always home-made once or twice a week. Farmers bought flour by the hundred-pound sack if they didn't raise their own wheat. But most raised their own wheat. When it was harvested they might sell some, but mostly they kept it for their own use, driving to the grist mill about six miles from Greenville. The machinery was turned by a big wheel in the river. The miller wouldn't never ask money. He ground the wheat into flour and kept out a certain amount as toll. Farmers never had much money, but somehow they didn't need much money in them days.

MRS. PEARSON, the midwife, was usually the only one that officiated at births, and I could hear Mrs. Washburn screaming. It was awful. They wouldn't let me into the room, of course, and all I could do was moon around the barn or the kitchen. Ted Washburn walked back and forth. His skin was the color of wet clay, his hands trembling.

It was near dark, and I had just lighted the lamp in the kitchen and was wondering if I oughtn't to cook something, but I didn't know what to cook or who would want to eat anyhow.

Ted sat down in a kitchen chair, put his elbow on the table, and massaged his hair in a way you would have thought he was trying to pull it out.

Finally he says to me, "Reno, I'm afraid she might die. I can't leave, but she's got to have a doctor."

I knowed what he wanted. "I'll go get him," I said. "I can do it all right."

"You bring him. I don't care what it costs. You bring Dr. Large, even if you got to kidnap him."

"I'll bring him," I says.

I went outside to the corral. We hadn't let Nigger out into the pasture yet. I didn't bother with a saddle, but just put on the bridle and a old blanket fastened on with a cinch strap, and I lit out for Forest Grove, nine miles away.

That was one of the longest rides I ever made; it was dark—dark with clouds and no moon or stars, so I had to ride mostly by guesswork, but you can pretty much trust a good horse in them situations, you don't try to control him too much. Lucky for me, the roads was fairly dried out.

I pulled up at Dr. Large's house in Forest Grove, tied the bridle to the hitching ring, and run up and hammered on the door. It was maybe nine, ten o'clock and the house all dark. I knocked a long time, and finally an upstairs window opened and Dr. Large put his head out.

"Who's there?"

I says, "Reno Ingles."

He calls out a second time, "Who is it? What is it?" The old doc was a little hard of hearing.

I shouts, "Reno Ingles!"

Well, he still didn't hear me, so he left the window and by and by he come puttering down the stairs and opens the front door and looks me over.

"Maybe you don't know me," I tells him, "but you was to my house once in Greenville. My name is Reno Ingles."

He didn't seem to remember but he nodded, and then I tell him about Mrs. Washburn having a baby and that she is dying. I have to shout it close to his ear.

"What's she dying of? The baby? I don't know the Washburns. Let me see." He riffled his fingers through his beard.

I was about crazy with him stalling around. "You got to come, Doc. She isn't very strong, and—"

"Of course I'll come," he says. "You listen close, young man. You go to Manning's Livery Stable and have him hitch up my usual team to a two-seater. I'll get dressed and go around to my office to get some instruments and some chloroform. I'll meet you in front of the office."

I KNEW WHERE Manning's livery stable was, and got on Nigger once more and rode down there, about three-four blocks. John Manning was inside, shoeing a horse. I told him, "John, is the team old Doc Large usually drives any good?"

"Slow," he says, hammering a nail, with the lantern on a stool close by. "Slow and gentle."

"It's nine miles," I told him. "And Mrs. Washburn is maybe dying. I want to get there fast. I want to drive them and drive them hard and know I won't hurt them."

He looked me over. I wasn't so tall, but I was husky and broad and looked older than fourteen, I looked maybe sixteen. And kids when they was sixteen was regarded as growed men. "I've got a team here," he says, " a high-powered team. But Doc won't ride in a buggy with them. He thinks they're outlaws. I'm not afraid to trust you with them, Reno—you been around horses all your life, but Doc won't ride with you."

"Ain't he nearsighted?"

"Sure. But once the lamps is lit, he'd recognize their rumps, even nearsighted."

"Hitch them up," I says.

So he got out this pair of grays from their stalls and hitched them up, and filled the lamps with kerosene but didn't light them. "You better light up after you get out a-ways. It's powerful dark," he says to me.

Leaving Nigger there, I drove the team around to Doc Large's office, and he stepped in with his bag, and I lit out, using the buggy whip. That was a high-powered pair of horses. We bumped and jounced and pitched, and I drove high-keyed with my legs braced, and the doc just hung on for dear life, gripping his black bag between his ankles and using both hands. It was pitch dark.

"Hadn't you better light the lamps?" he shouts.

But I don't pay no attention.

"What team is this?"

Still I didn't say nothing, but just drove for all that team was worth.

After about three miles out, I stopped and lit the lamps. You couldn't see much with them. Mostly they was to warn anybody else who might be on the road so you wouldn't have a pile-up. Mostly you drove by feel and instinct.

When Doc recognized the team, he says, "They are outlaws!"

I told him they was a good team, fast, but not outlaws at all.

"Well," he says, "I reckon if you can drive them I can ride with them."

We arrived in double-quick time, and while the doc went upstairs I unhitched the team and bedded them down for the night, with some grain for each animal. And then I went into the house and hung around downstairs moping and not eating, not feeling like eating, and nobody come down to eat. By and by Mrs. Washburn's screams stopped, but I could hear low-pitched voices coming from upstairs.

I must of gone to sleep because next thing I knowed I was laying half across the kitchen table, my arms stretched out, and about froze stiff so it took me a lot of jumping and banging to thaw out while I was getting the fire to going and starting breakfast.

By and by, Doc come down. I didn't want to ask him, but I had to know. He hadn't said anything, just set down with his chin in his hands and his eyes faraway and bloodshot from being up all night. Finally he said, "God giveth and God taketh away," and with that he pitched into breakfast like he hadn't eat for a week.

I said, "She's—"

He just nodded. After a while he said, "It wasn't the baby. She had a weak heart, lad. Always had. From fever when she was a child. That was the main reason why her family didn't want her to marry Ted Washburn, but they couldn't very well tell her. From what Mr. Washburn said, I reckon she realized that baby would kill her."

"Is — — is the baby dead, too?"

He nodded and kept on eating.

I WENT OUTSIDE to hitch up his team. I wasn't crying any. If you was fourteen, you wasn't supposed to cry any. Only girls cried. I had the team waiting when the doc come out, and I was setting there ready to drive him back. He shoved me out of the buggy.

"I guess if a youngun like you can drive that team, I can. The postman can bring your horse back, lad."

I got out and he picked up the reins. "Here," he said, and he held out two silver dollars to me. "That's for coming in and driving me last night."

"Thanks," I said. Maybe you figure I shouldn't of took the money. But I learned early if it gives folks pleasure to give you money, you better take pleasure in taking it. I knowed he'd got from Mr. Washburn the regular fee of two dollars a mile for country calls, standard in them days, out of which eighteen dollars he'd give me two, and the team would cost him eight or ten, not leaving him much for his night's work.

He drove off. After a while I went up to Mr. Washburn and I handed him the two dollars and said, "Maybe this will help pay for the coffin." He took the money, but I don't think he even heard what I was saying.

After the coffin come that day and was put up in the parlor, Mr. Washburn set hisself down for the wake, just setting there, looking at her face and holding her dead hand for two days and two nights. I'm morally certain he never slept a wink in all that time.

When the funeral was over I stayed on with him for a while, but it was so drooping around that house that I most couldn't stand it, with Mr. Washburn going around like he was half alive and didn't know what was going on.

When the chance for the job at the mill come, I hooked onto it in a hurry.

Mr. Washburn never did remarry. He stayed right on that place and after a while he hired a woman to keep house and look after the kitchen chores, and later on another hired hand to help him with the work. He stayed right on there and lived out his life and never did remarry and have the children that Ginny Washburn wanted him to have.

The ladies of Greenville said it was a pity, because Mrs. Washburn was too good and pretty and frail to live anyhow and Mr. Washburn ought to have a wife and children. But he never did.

This episode marked the end of Reno's boyhood. The next time you read about him he'll be a man— and getting into all the trouble that a frontier environment and his particular talents could generate.

John McCaffrey House

Dear Sir:

I thoroughly enjoyed Tom Barkdull's narrative of his "rediscovery" of the town of Zonia, Arizona. I hope Mr. Barkdull will not be offended if I ask a question concerning one of the photos. In the shot of the John McCaffrey house, it looks as if the roof is covered with corrugated GI sheeting. There is also a very "new" looking stovepipe protruding just above the stone wall section. Has someone made the town his permanent home?

Your magazines have made my year here in 'Nam a little more bearable and I want to thank you very much. Our PX

PRINCIPLE OF OPERATION

The Treasureprobe operates by comparing the frequencies of two colpitts oscillators and amplifying the audio frequency which is the sum of the difference. The fixed oscillator is in the molded handle of the Treasureprobe, and is controlled by the thumbwheel tuner. The variable oscillator is in the search coil and changes its inductance when the search coil is brought into close proximity of any metal. This difference when amplified is heard in the earphone as an audio signal tone.

has a "number 10" variety of magazines (as the Vietnamese say about something that doesn't appeal to them), but yours show up about every other month. They don't last long!

My family and I will be back to our bottle and relic hunting trips this summer and we intend to visit a couple of sites I've read about in your magazines. (We always obtain permission before undertaking any excavating.) I'm especially interested in articles about my native Pacific Northwest but also enjoy all other areas as they were in the days of the "Old West."—Richard Dixon, Pacific Architects & Engineers, 121st Assault Helicopter Co., AML Box 52, APO San Francisco 96296

Dear Mr. Dixon:

First let me say that you're very observant to have noted the roof and stovepipe on the McCaffrey house, and I'm not at all offended. I wish that all readers were that intensely interested. The question certainly deserves an answer, and I think you'll agree that it's almost a story in itself.

At many of the old townsites in the Southwest I find that one of the buildings has been reroofed and repaired for use as a line camp. This was true in the cases of Spencer Spring and Tip Top, but the work on the McCaffrey house was a different and more fascinating undertaking.

I first drove into Zonia in the early spring as related in the True West article. On that occasion I explored the townsite and took several pictures, including one of the stone house which shows the corrugated metal roof, but no stovepipe. As I returned on various trips during that summer (once when I met Charlie Brown) I snapped other shots but seemed to invariably get an overexposure of the stone house due to a bounce off the ground in front and off the front wall. You'll notice this even in the picture published, but it was the best one.

On the trip that I took the picture you have asked about, I found some changes had taken place: a 1938 Chevy was parked under the oaks, a child's swing had been hung from one of the trees, a stovepipe had appeared in the front wall, and the stone fireplace which is in the rear of the house had been completely repaired!

I unpacked my lunch under the trees and had just begun to enjoy the peace and quiet when McCaffrey's front door opened and out came a woman of about thirty-five with a little boy of perhaps eight tagging behind her. This came as a complete surprise because I knew that the townsite had been bought by McAlester Fuel Co., McAlester, Oklahoma, for copper exploration work, and mining companies are particular regarding trespassers. The lady was most pleasant and introduced herself as Ruth. As we chatted I heard her story which I later confirmed through McAlester employes.

Ruth had come from Ohio with a small widow's pension, looking for a place to resign from the world, at the same time escaping the skyrocketing living costs of civilization. She had bumped around the back country until she happened onto Zonia. Then she proceeded to rebuild the fireplace by herself, installed the stovepipe all alone, renovated the house and moved in as a classic squatter. Later, when I was retained by McAlester to do their mineral survey for patent proceedings, I asked why they had no objection to her remaining in the old house. Their reply was that she was a perfect watchman for the premises, and that they were even giving her a few bucks to help her along as it was their belief that they'd have one whale of a time having her evicted anyway.

I have been back to Zonia recently since the mining company has built a plant, offices, testing lab, etc. They had trained Ruth well enough in running tests on ore samples that she was their lab man on the graveyard shift. She was writing a book about which she was very secretive, besides teaching her boy regular lessons four hours every day (the school authorities had not bothered her, probably because of the remoteness of her "home"). My wife and I have become friends of Ruth and drop in on her whenever we're in that part of the back country. As you've undoubtedly gathered, she's quite a gal.

And so, Richard, we can call that THE BIRTH OF A FIREPLACE (or something). The roof must remain a mystery. It's impossible to tag an age on it, as corrugated metal is found in abundance on every ancient street in the West. One more detail: Hassayampa Joe's house had collapsed flat as a tortilla, right on top

"You can't sell 'em if we can't find 'em!" This comes from our readers in a flow of letters that is too constant for comfort! I've found them myself, sometimes on the bottom shelf, completely covered by other publications. Now we don't have nuthin' against other publications, but we'd like a breath of fresh air and the sight of light now and then ourselves—so if you find our magazines covered, we'd sure appreciate your leaving them in the same approximate spot, but at least giving them a show. We can also show you purple bottles, pack saddles, miners' lamps and all kinds of western memorabilia and relics at our cabin seven miles above Prescott, Arizona, where the closest neighbor is three miles away, the coffee is always on, and the talk is easy, warm and westerny.—Tom Barkdull these isolated habitations, and hundreds of small way-stations have completely passed from the scene, remembered only by name or legend. At each one there was only a single main building of adobe, it windowless. If anyone wanted more light, he had to step outside!

A small brush corral was just outside and water could be procured from a shallow well or nearby creek. The lonely desert stretched for miles in all directions. A stout door closed off the only entrance to each adobe building and there were small holes cut into each wall for defense against marauding Indians, of which there were too many. Renegade whites and Indians were a constant menace right after the Mexican War and shortly after the Gadsden Purchase in 1854.

THAT MEN could be hired to live under such lonely circumstances and in such obvious daily danger is something at which to marvel. Their single function was to be ready when the stage came through and to care for the mules or horses between changes. Early stages were pulled by six mules; later runs were made twice daily with six horses pulling the coaches. On top of the Concord rode the driver and sometimes his heavily armed guard. Behind them, and also hung on the back, were boxes, trunks and very often one or two extra wheels. It was hoped that eventually spare wheels would be kept at every station so that this extra weight would not have to be carried.

The remote and primitive way-stations have largely disappeared. Although a rare few have been located and photographed, most of these are on private land and permission must be secured to explore their meager ruins. Generally, the stations still existing were part of the ten stone forts or buildings constructed to protect travelers in areas where Indian attacks were most vicious.

A few of the larger way-stations, more favorably located, later grew to be regular ranch sites. One was located at Maricopa Wells and another at Stanwix, both of which were between Tucson and Yuma.

Before going out onto the open range to look for remnants of these early rest stops, one must learn something about the stage companies themselves. The Butterfield Overland Mail Company is the best known, but it was neither the first nor the last to travel over the same general route. Before it came the San Antonio & San Diego Mail, better known as the "S.A. & S.D." By November 1, 1857 this company was operating from San Diego and was ready to serve the hardy traveler who dared or had to make the trip to San Antonio, Texas. But even this line was not the first to travel these roads, for surely single travelers or even wagontrains of sorts had already ventured west.

Each wagon driver picked the way which looked best to him and after a while many of these random roads began to mingle and run together. Quite naturally, the S.A. & S.D. made use of this blazed trail wherever it could and stopped at whatever lonely ranch house was near the chosen route. Gradually the mutual needs of traveler and settler brought them closer together.

When the Butterfield Overland Mail Company began operating over the same route in the fall of 1858, it used most of the crude facilities of the S.A. & S.D. and continued to do so for the next few years. When the Civil War erupted, troops were largely pulled out of what is now Arizona and the Indians were free to roam as they wished. In the spring of 1861 all of the Butterfield stations were closed and freight wagons rumbled across the desert, gathering up most of their supplies. Several thousand mules and horses were rounded up also and driven to nearby towns to be sold to ranchers. Mining communities had become more numerous and many small ranches had made their appearance.

Smaller, short-run stage lines sprang up then to serve communities in northern and central Arizona. Stage lines ran briefly between Phoenix and Prescott and from Ehrenberg to Prescott. Freight hauling was done on an irregular basis between most towns and mining camps in Arizona, utilizing the remains of the Butterfield stations where possible.

WITH the end of the Civil War the West really opened up and a mail line was inaugurated in 1867 along the southern route. By 1875 the Texas and California Stage Company had begun daily service from Fort Worth to San Diego. Within a year most of the stations were restocked and the stage line was giving regular daily mail service! This did much to encourage the movement west and greatly helped to establish hundreds of mining camps by delivering heavy equipment to them. At the same time, countless other freight lines followed the same routes, most of whose names have long been lost. Sometimes the same adobe buildings were used, and in some instances the old ones were torn down and the materials moved or reused to build larger structures.

Most important for the present-day searcher is to remember that the actual route shifted and moved many times. It is not always possible to say the Butterfield Overland Mail Company stages passed over some exact spot. River crossings had to be changed because of flash floods; gullies were deepened by desert storms and the road had to go another way; ranchers were burned out, and new ranch buildings went up in a more convenient spot. Even so, it is possible to locate definitely some of the original ruts made by the Concord coaches of the 1860s.

In following the mail route, it is wise to compare old and new maps and to consider the meanings of various place names. Some of them were in Mexican or Indian word-forms. Picacho means peak and Lago Del Rio means lake by the river, while La Cienega refers to a marshy place. In contrast, Sinagua sounds almost like Cienega, but means a "place without water." Some stations took the name of the ranch they were on or had other designations because of their location, past history or appearance. Maricopa Wells, Mission Camp or Oatman Flats are prime examples of these.

The trail can be picked up at the Arizona border just north of U.S. Highway 80-86 near the ruins of Stein's, New Mexico. It was from here that the first western run of the Butterfield Overland Mail Company entered Arizona at 6:00 p. m. on October 1, 1858, arriving at Tucson one day later. Stagecoaches were forced to go through this pass in the center of the Peloncillo Mountains, after crossing Alkali Flats. This was the only way west from El Paso, Texas, and even today railroads, highway, and telephone lines all go through the same tight passage. Only one hundred yards north of the highway right-of-way can be seen the demolished town of Stein's. About two dozen wrecked buildings remain and the dirt road, passing through town, is visible from the highway. Above Stein's can be seen several tailing dumps from small mine operations which have long been closed down. From here the wagon ruts drop down into the San Simon River Valley.

THE FIRST of Arizona's twenty-six stations was on the east bank of the San Simon River where an earthen reservoir was built to contain the infrequent rains. From San Simon Station the route led southwest to the Dos Cabezas Mountains, entering them at Apache Pass. Apache Pass was the highest point in the "West Division," with an elevation of 5,115 feet, and was the scene of many Indian attacks. The route ran through a deep gorge about four miles long, known to be the most dangerous stretch in Arizona. In June, 1862 Fort Bowie was established nearby to protect the important springs which were in the pass. Puerto Del Dado Springs were defended by the garrison for nearly twenty years between 1867 and 1886 when the full complement of troops was withdrawn. The dirt road which runs today from San Simon to the eastern entrance to the pass is the same one used by the coaches in 1858.

The third station west was at Captain Richard Stoddard Ewell's, about five miles southwest of Dos Cabezas, the mountain with "Two Heads." From Ewell's Springs the mail route continued on to the southwest, passing below the Willcox dry lake until it reached Dragoon Springs. This station was about two miles southeast of the present post office of Dragoon. After leaving Dragoon Springs, the route went west through Ceurca Pass and followed along Dragoon Wash until it neared Benson. This section is very close to the tracks of the Southern Pacific Railroad, although the main highway is two miles farther north and goes through Texas Canyon.

San Pedro Station was on the east bank of the river about one mile downstream from Benson. There are two dirt roads north of the railway bridge, either one of which could have been used in the past for fording the river. The one at B.M. 3528 is probably the correct one because there is a matching road on the other side of the San Pedro River. Continuing on to Tucson, the route went gradually uphill through the very small town of Mescal and dropped down to the sixth station at La Cienega. La Cienega Station was the scene of several bloody fights and was two and one half miles downhill from Pantano. Its site is now beneath the tracks of the Southern Pacific Railroad and was probably on the north side of the wash, directly across from its junction with Davidson Canyon.

From there the run on to Tucson was much easier because it was all open ground, paralleling Pantano Wash after going through Vail. At Vail the stagecoaches turned abruptly to the northwest, passing the present site of an old cemetery, some gravel pits, and then entering what is now the Davis-Monthan Air Force Base. By comparing old maps with modern air photos, the actual dirt road can be traced west from Benson almost to the Blue Water Station. The Butterfield route entered Davis-Monthan A.F.B. near Rankin's place, went on northwest past the flight line and parking areas where sleek B-47 jet bombers are in storage, cut close to Vandenberg Village and left the base at East 29th Street and Alvernon Way. In Tucson itself, there was a regular staging station at Pennington and Pearl, now the center of the downtown section of the city.

BEYOND TUCSON, the stage route went north on the east bank of the Santa Cruz River until it reached Jayne's Station, where the river was forded and the coaches pressed on to Point of Mountain, Station Eight. Point of Mountain Station was about one mile south of Rillito. Here the mountains were left behind and the route went on to Picacho Pass where the buildings and corrals were approximately one mile southeast of the present Wynola siding of the Southern Pacific Railroad.

Some maps show the stages crossing the Santa Cruz near downtown Tucson and following the river to the northwest along a road now called Silverbell. Most likely both roads were used, depending upon the amount of water in the river, which used to have a steady flow. Either route would have taken them across the river before it was joined by Rillito Creek and Canada Del Oro Wash.

Near Picacho Pass the Santa Cruz disappeared into the sands and the next station was at Blue Water, some forty-five miles northwest of Tucson. This station has completely disappeared as has any trace of an old road in this area. Truck farming and irrigation is extensively practiced here and nothing remains. The Blue Water Station is believed to be about three miles east of Toltec and was the only water around for miles.

Between Blue Water and Sacaton was Station Eleven, a very small outpost known as Oneida. This was just one mile northeast of Casa Grande and nothing remains of it, either. Sacaton Station also is no more, and even Maricopa Wells has largely vanished. Only a few crumbling walls and a hole in the ground remain to show where a well once was. There once was a Station Thirteen, known as Casa Blanca, and it was midway between Sacaton and Maricopa Wells. This was a very temporary stop at the home of Mr. Ammi Mitchell White, the first steam miller in Arizona.

To the west of Maricopa Wells used to be a stop known as Deserts. This is not to be confused with Desert Wells near Tucson or with Desert Station near Vicksburg, Arizona. Deserts was in a pass in the Maricopa Mountains, but the exact location has not yet been found. I believe it was on the dirt road very close to the Indian village of Estrella. Beyond Deserts the next station was Gila Ranch on the south bank of the meandering Gila River. Gila Ranch, or Gila Bend, is one of the few stations which developed into a thriving city.

Going west from Station Sixteen, one passes a string of stations, the first one being Murderer's Grave. This place had a number of names including Kinyon's, in honor of Marcus Kinyon, and later Kenyon's after Mr. Charles Kenyon. The stop had a lurid past filled with a double murder, a lynching and several other killings. Travelers were always anxious to leave for the next stop, Oatman Flat, seventeen miles farther west. At this station the Oatman family had been slaughtered but it was known as quite a lively stop. Beyond it was Burke's Camp, a haying station constantly plagued by Indian attacks and ambushes.

Station Twenty had at least four different names at different times, and one can take his choice. Stanwix or Flapjack Ranch was also a haying station about seven miles west of the town of Sentinel. Around it were bountiful fields of grain with a vegetable garden which surely contributed to its reputation for good meals. The same station or one very close by was called either Griswell's or Grinnell's. There is some duplication in names here and it is most likely that all four names apply to the same place because the postmaster at Stanwix officially is listed as Henry Grinnell, the man who ransomed Olive Oatman from her Indian captivity in 1856.

THIS STRIP is the land of the Aztec Hills. It is land as empty and desolate as you can find, with extensive lava fields all around. Death due to entirely natural causes was right at hand without adding the extra peril of vengeful Indians. Approaching Peterman's Ranchero or Mohawk Pass there was a long grade of which the waiting braves were perfectly willing to take advantage. Stages in this area had to be constantly on the alert and this particular station was subjected, also, to a long series of accidents, shootings, and assorted tragedies. Apparently, it was first located at the ranchero right on the Gila River, but after its demolishment by a particularly bad flash-flood, the route must have been moved to the more difficult, but more permanent, way over Mohawk Pass.

Motorists today can stop at the very top of Mohawk Pass and see the sad remains of the ruined buildings. Most of the area is littered with trash, old automobile bodies, and the debris of a defunct gas station, but the old Butterfield road is still discernible in spots on the south side of the highway below. When driving up the pass, if you carefully look back to the east you can see faint signs of the route as it approaches the Mohawk Mountains. It then runs unevenly close to the highway, threading its original way over rocks and through the dry gullies. Beyond the pass, the stage road dropped down to Station Twenty-Two at Antelope and then went on to Filibuster's Camp, forty-four miles east of Yuma, Arizona.

With only a few stops left to go before reaching Yuma, the stages changed horses at Mission Camp and then raced on to Swiveller's Ranch on the bend of the Gila River. The correct spelling should be Jacob Snively's, a station which later grew to be the first boom mining town in all of Arizona in 1858. Under its new name, Gila City prospered until it was swept away by a flood in 1862.

The last stop in Arizona was at Yuma on the Colorado River. First known as Colorado City, it changed its name to Arizona City in 1858 and eventually became Yuma. Fort Yuma was on the California side of the river and travelers went on beyond there on muleback across the sand hills west. They passed through San Bernardino to reach the Pacific Coast at Los Angeles. Those bound for San Francisco followed on through San Joaquin Valley.

And now the dust has settled. The loud voice of the stage driver urging his horses on and the rattle of wagon wheels will never again echo from the hills of the Southwest. The stagecoach is gone. Nevertheless, an adventurous and imaginative searcher can still find traces of the route if he looks hard enough. I know they are still there, because I have walked along them for miles with my son. It's worth all the trouble just to live in the past for a short while.

I would suggest that you don't postpone your search indefinitely, however, lest the flash-flood of today—"progress"—erase the last vestige of John Butterfield's exciting road west.

wadded in the gunnysack hanging from my shoulders), I was a pretty unwelcome sight. However, soap, water, and a hot iron did wonders. The next morning found me employed by Artcrafts as one of six artists. I was to be their illustrator for three years with few vacations back to the ranch.

a big harness manufacturing firm. For weeks the art department was draped with harness as I made the drawings. I would draw the harness direct on a large photo blowup of a team. I did the saddles as well, and my boss was delighted that I was familiar with the different rigs—double rigged, three quarter, center fire, etc. Another job the company threw my way which was down my alley was the Olathe Boot Company catalog.

Artcrafts was on the fifth floor of the Jenkins Music Building. On the first floor was a pretty lass and musician, Lola Andrews. I bought so much sheet music as an excuse to see her that common sense told me marriage was cheaper. In six months we had set up housekeeping. For spare money I'd buy paint and canvas and work many hours at night. That first Christmas was nip and tuck with furniture payments, rent, and coal bills stacking up. Then a $200 check from Lothrop, Lee and Shephard, publishers, eased the pressure. I had done the illustrations and cover jacket for a book on the Pony Express, The Youngest Rider by Louise Platt Hauck.

My pay at the engraving firm had been $35 a week, but it soon jumped to $75. With overtime I usually made more than a hundred dollars, which was good pay in the twenties.

The day Lindbergh arrived in Paris, May 27, 1927, our son Fred III was born. Money was still short so I sold my boss, Bill Guenther, a large cowboy oil painting for the exact amount to get my wife and "Fritz," as we called him, out of the Missouri Methodist Hospital.

THREE YEARS had slipped by happily but rather slowly, I thought. Sitting back of a drawing board was a long "whoop and holler" from the ever-changing mountain trails I had followed with a good horse under me. In art work, painting intrigued me most, but with a family and money obligations there was need to be practical. Too, a Bohemian life had little appeal. St. Joe was a nice city, but not large enough for high salaries.

Walt had written for me to join him in Hollywood so I took a short vacation and grabbed the Santa Fe to California. My two brothers were with him in his first, fast-growing studio. It was nice to see Walt and my brothers, but the future as an animated cartoonist just wasn't what I was cut out for. After a few visits to Universal and other movie art departments, I hurried home with other ideas.

One of my letters of inquiry brought an offer from Buckbee-Mears, a very large St. Paul, Minnesota, firm. They needed an illustrator and liked the samples of my work. In a new Whippet automobile, which had little more space in it than a couple of saddle bags, I headed north that December in the worst blizzard I ever saw. Plowing through snow-covered and deserted roads, I felt thankful that Lola and the baby were following by train. We got settled quickly in a two-room apartment and then I hurried downtown to hock a cheap diamond ring for fifteen bucks. I had paid all my bills before leaving St. Joe so the wallet was pretty thin until the first pay check at the end of the week.

Buckbee-Mears' art department was the largest in the Northwest and I learned much from its many fine and diversified artists. However, restlessness still gnawed at me and resulted in my forming a partnership with Pat McGinnis, a great advertising man and an old friend. Our first guarantee of an income was from my art end of the business. Buckbee-Mears did not replace me, but preferred free-lancing their illustrating over to me. It usually ran $1,000 a month which I tossed into our own company. Harmon-McGinnis did very well until 1932 and the great depression. That stopped our saving for the ranch Lola and I had hoped to have some day out in my old Colorado stomping grounds. Too, commercial illustrating—drawing chickens and underwear ads—was boring me and bored, I just didn't function. I decided I would get into western art work or bust.

I had been painting some western oils to which I put stories and contracted with the Des Moines Register-Tribune for syndication in the Sunday rotogravure section. Full of faith in this new venture, I sold out my interest in the advertising company, built a trailer to haul our keepsakes, and with my family headed west over that high bridge in St. Paul.

IT WAS spring of '33. We plowed mud and late snow for days before arriving at Dad's ranch where he was living with his lovely new wife, Mary. We arrived just as six-year-old Fritz was coming down with measles.

My first chore was to build a cabin. It was to be our home until fortune smiled and we could buy our own ranch. (I didn't dream that we would have to wait seven long years.) With team and ax, I tackled the pine trees and snaked them up to my cleared cabin site up a timbered canyon and far from the road. All my past experience with horses and lumber camps came to use as the callouses on my hands thickened.

It was Lola's first experience in rough country. She enjoyed the life, with occasional pack trips to high up mountain lakes for fishing. Spring and summer passed quickly. Anxious to have our own quarters, we moved into our incompleted cabin. Noisy pack rats, investigating the new tenants, alarmed my wife so I suspended our beds from the rafters. Each night I would leave the lantern turned low and fall asleep with a rifle pointed toward the unchinked log walls.

All through spring and summer I had been waiting impatiently for an order from the newspaper syndicate so I could begin painting, but the orders never came and we were desperate for an income. Lola was tired of washing clothes in the river and I had neglected my art. I made a bunch of pen and ink cowboy drawings and took off for Hollywood to seek employment, leaving Lola and Fritz in the doorless cabin to fend off the inquisitive mountain varmints as best they could.

Stendahl Galleries on Wilshire displayed my drawings in a one-man show, but no job showed up. When it was time to put our boy in school, I rented an apartment, sold my car, and sent Lola money for train fare. We kept the orange groves in business for some time. Oranges then were cheap—all I could stack on my lean withers for two-bits.

The boys at my brother's studio chipped in to finance me in a syndicate venture to get my newly created cowboy strip on the market. It was called "Bronc Peeler and Little Beaver," forerunner of Red Ryder and Little Beaver. That was 1934 and we struggled along with me drawing the strip, writing it, having the engravings made and mats sent to the newspapers, as well as traveling all over the country to sell the strip to editors. It was a losing battle and debts piled higher than a feed-lot dung heap. I had to bury my western comic strip.

DURING the five years in Hollywood, many life-long friends were made in and out of the movie studios. Gene Autry was just starting and we would often gab about our futures. Later he was to make a Red Ryder movie for me. We are still friends after more than thirty years.

Naturally most of my acquaintances were horse-minded. Will James would come by my studio to shoot windies. I was made an honorary member of the Chuckwagon Trailers, a batch of old hombres who had punched cows prior to 1905. Herbert (Andy) Anderson, famous woodcarver and former Colorado cowboy, was a member and close friend until his death a few years ago. I got to know many men who were big names in cattle and law—as well as outlaws: Emmett, the last of the Daltons; and Al Jennings, the old train robber; Wm. S. Hart and many other actors were part of the scene. George Russell, champion rodeo rider turned movie cowboy, was another Westerner who enriched and influenced my career as a painter. George was a Montana cowboy and nephew of the famous artist, Charles Russell. George and I have been very close during all these years and he has one of the best collections in the country of my paintings and Andy's woodcarvings. Montie Montana, another Montana cowboy trick rider, and his family were regular visitors at our ranch. Montie is considered dean of trick riders and ropers. These people, along with many old Pagosa characters, have been my life. Without them I would have neither their friendship nor as much knowledge of the Old West to be passed on through my brush.

Curley Fletcher, cowboy-turned-writer and known as the Cowboys' Poet and author of "The Strawberry Roan," stomped into my studio one day and we took a quick liking to each other—and here I was off on another money-losing venture. A third partner, a promoter with a police record, offered to put up the money to match our talents, so Curley and I started a slick western magazine. Not being able to afford help, Curley and I wrote and illustrated the entire magazine. Ride lasted three issues and we folded up, thousands of dollars in the red. Reckon we were a little ahead of our time with a good magazine. However we had no big market and worst of all no money. The promoter's money turned out to be a pipe dream.

Meanwhile, I had illustrated a Big Little book, Cowboy Lingo, for Sam Lowe, president of Whitman Publishing Company of Racine, Wisconsin, and New York. Mr. Lowe was a fine gentleman and his interest in my western work led to what I'll call Fame and Glory and the turning point after years of struggle. Mr. Lowe talked a New York agent, Stephen Slesinger, into representing me. Before I knew it, he had mailed expenses for our trip East to do a large illustrated book on cowboys and Indians. Much of the work I already had finished when Lola and I dropped off eleven-year-old Fritz with my Dad and Mary in Colorado while we traveled on to New York.

Leaving Lola in the lobby of a hotel next to Grand Central Station, I paid a visit to the Slesinger office which I found was just around the corner on Park Avenue. As I entered, a pretty secretary ogled my tight britches and boots and immediately called Mr. Slesinger at his Connecticut estate. Two hours later, Lola and I were met by his chauffeur and whisked twenty miles through beautiful green country to Redding Ridge where he and Sam Lowe awaited us.

The magnificence of the place overwhelmed us. However, the ice was soon broken and we were on a first-name basis. Steve, Sam, and I began a long, profitable and exciting friendship which lasted through their lifetimes. I was thirty-six years old then, and with twenty-two of them filled with hard work, the feeling that success had somehow shied clear had haunted me. But thirty more years of cows, horses, art, movies, world travel, rodeos, and painting lay just beyond this eastern door through which I had stumbled.

DURING the first six months I illustrated many books for children, but still had that western strip in mind. One afternoon while Slesinger was in California, Fred Ferguson, president of Scripps Howard's NEA newspaper syndicate, came in the office inquiring about a Fred Harman he had heard about who drew a Little Beaver cartoon. When I stuck out my eager paw and said, "Howdy, I'm Fred Harman," he dang near lost his voice in surprise.

I quickly drew up a Sunday page similar to the one I had flunked out on in Hollywood, but changed the name to Red Ryder and Little Beaver. I called Steve long distance and he rushed back to New York. We three signed the first ten-year contract for dailies and Sunday. The first Red Ryder strip appeared Sunday, December 8, on the front page of the comic section of the first issue of Marshall Field's Chicago Sun. Almost overnight Red Ryder and Little Beaver were a success. With the twentieth paper, front page of the Los Angeles Times, Republic Pictures bought the movie rights for a series; and ten years of three half-hour radio shows weekly over national networks followed. Forty by-products used the name, including Daisy Manufacturing Co. with their popular Red Ryder Carbine air rifle. Red and his sidekick were soon galloping through the pages of 750 newspapers. Shortly the strip was being seen and read all over the world in many different languages.

The first fine artist I met in New York was Russell Patterson, famous since College Humor days for his drawings of the beautiful "Patterson Girls." Russ took this country boy under his wing. He, along with Arthur William Brown, noted old Saturday Evening Post illustrator, put me up for membership in the Society of Illustrators. Some of the greats of the art, literary, and show world, as well as people in public life, enjoyed the club house on 63rd Street. Joseph P. Kennedy, father of the late President, has been an honorary member of the Society for many years. Our annual charity show always brought out imposing lists of celebrities. I liked to "ham it up" and enjoyed being on programs with Fred Waring, Bob Hope, Jerry Colonna and many others.

On another charity show in Brooklyn, I appeared on the stage with Steve Allen and Jack Dempsey. Jack was from Manassa, Colorado over the range from my home country. Backstage we got to talking about our early years. Jack made a remark I will never forget, "Fred, it takes a hungry scrapper to win a fight!"

In the summer of 1940 Lola and I had found a spot on the side of Square Top Mountain with a magnificent view of the San Juan Range, a part of the Continental Divide. All that winter in my New York studio, I counted the days until we could return to Colorado and start building a cabin. We had dreamed of a hideaway, but the news media picked up the story and named it the Red Ryder Ranch. It wasn't long before we were deluged with tourists.

Thinking I would have privacy for the daily deadlines on my comic strip, I built a studio high up on a steep rise behind the cabin, making the climb each day by horseback. However nothing deterred the visitors. Sometimes even elderly folks on crutches made the trip that found my pony blowing for air in the 8,500-foot altitude.

OVER THE YEARS, I've had many Little Beavers. Since the ranch was only some thirty-five miles from the Jicarilla Reservation, it was often from these Indian friends that I would find a real-life Little Beaver for rodeo and public appearances. A youngster had to be fairly at ease in a crowd, photogenic and able to ride. Usually a boy would outgrow the part in three years. Troy Vicenti, now serving with the Marines in Vietnam, was with me the longest.

Not only did I have many amusing experiences with the Little Beavers, but also with the public. One time back at the stables at the Spanish Trails Fiesta in Durango, Colorado, a couple from the East introduced themselves and asked me to pull their grandson's tooth. I was flabbergasted, but they insisted they had made the long trip for that express purpose. Montie Montana, standing beside me, about blew his Stetson and grabbed his camera. I tried to get out of that dangerous chore; I was afraid of infection around a stable, but egged on by a quick-forming crowd, I yanked out the tooth with a pair of Montie's pliers. It developed that the old folks hoped to get the kid on Gary Moore's "I've Got a Secret" with "Red Ryder pulled my tooth!"

No matter what happened, the daily and Sunday newspaper strips had to be in the mail. I have been boogered up with rope burns and broken bones, but somehow always met my deadlines even with steel braces and splints. On trips around the country with Little Beaver and my horses, I would have to sit up nights in hotels and tourist courts to meet those newspaper deadlines.

The Second World War added a few demands on folks in art and show business, but it was a rewarding experience traveling around to stimulate War Bond sales for the Treasury Department. The Department of Defense also called on us to make trips all over Europe, Japan and Korea to entertain the Armed Forces. During the war, the Little Beaver bombers fought in the European Theater while another group, the Little Beaver Navy Destroyers, distinguished itself under the command of Arleigh A. Burke who became famous as "31 Knot Burke" and later CNO of the Navy under President Eisenhower.

Doing a western comic strip was good training for the biggest saddle I ever rode. Crowding painting into my busy schedule was increasingly impossible. Our son had married the lovely girl next door, Blanche Dobson, made us grandparents of a mighty fine boy, Fred IV, and was well established back East with CBS Television so with the trail growing shorter, I decided to get on with the oil painting. Red Ryder had reached great heights, but I wanted to get some of the life I had lived and the people I had known on canvas.

The buyers of my paintings are from all walks of life and from all over the country. Their friendship is very rewarding. Occasionally a good customer joins us in a trip to the Indian country. Lola and I often grocery-up our large truck camper and hie to the back country for fresh ideas. It was on just such a trip among my Navajo friends that I sketched the weird "Yei Bei Chai" sacred healing dance, the oil rendition of which is now hanging in the National Cowboy Hall of Fame in Oklahoma City.

The Government recently made a TV color film of me for a series of "Americans at Work." I have had many and various awards and feel very grateful living in a land such as ours where a country boy can go so far on his own initiative.

If old Bill Flaugh were alive to read this, he would say, "That old Hereford face has shore got diarrhea of the mouth!" Mebbe, but I find it exciting, and each morning arise at daybreak in my home studio in Albuquerque, pour a cup of coffee, and dash to that unfinished canvas while pulling on my pants.

Mormon Mountain's Silver Mystery

Not until after Mormon Dairy was abandoned and the settlers had moved elsewhere did anyone try finding the silver mountain. Men who had failed to make a strike in the Grand Canyon country came in as the Mormons straggled out. Smith remained for some time afterwards, running his Circle S brand.

Several of the earlier searchers dug tunnels and made diggings in the mountain canyons and on top. At least two put down shafts across the lake on the east rim. Their failures caused the lost silver to become regarded as a myth, somebody's whiskey talk.

JOHN MARSHALL and his son, Charley, prospected on the Colorado River near La Paz and at Ehrenberg. On coming to Flagstaff they heard the story of a lost mountain of silver. Marshall took up a homestead and prowled the country around Mormon Lake. Nearby Marshall Lake was named for him.

Their dryland farming wasn't much of a go. Eventually father and son took employment in town. During 1891 they prospected all over Mormon Mountain. The next year they were still at it with high hopes, as reported by the Arizona Champion (Flagstaff) October 5, 1892:

> John Marshall and son Charley returned this week after spending more than a month around Mormon Mountain. They searched the region for traces of a lost silver lode supposed to have been found there by settlers, when they first arrived at Mormon Lake to make their homes.
> John says that assays of ore found in the lost mine assayed $600 to $800 a ton. Two prospectors, Jim Taylor and Ike Roberts, located the silver bearing body in 1878, after hearing about it from local residents. Not being valuable enough to warrant freighting out to a mill, they covered it, to await a better opportunity to dispose of it.
> Arrival of the railroad through Flagstaff in 1883 made it possible to ship to a mill, but Taylor and Roberts were no longer in the country.
> Friend Johnny says that he knows where the lost silver mine is, in a general area, and proposes to locate and file on it in the spring.

However, "friend Johnny," who had upped the silver's value from the wild tales he'd been told, did not find the lost mine the next spring or any other. But he and Charley continued hunting for it until the elder Marshall's death.

Ed Strom and Mike La Salla also did some prospecting in 1892. At the very beginning of their search they traced out an ancient trail whose original makers were never identified. It either began or ended close to Flagstaff on the south, no one ever knew which. Perhaps it started as a wild game and Indian trail, and became more defined by use after white men entered the country.

This trace, which can still be found, rounded a mesa point and Walnut Canyon northwest of and just above Lake Mary. The lake-to-be was known then as Clark Valley, after John Clark who ranched and operated a sawmill there. It became a lake in 1903 when the Arizona Timber and Lumber Company dammed the narrow lower end, the beginning of Walnut Canyon.

The old trail struck off south from the mesa point and crossed the first wagon road to Mormon Lake. It is traceable for about three miles before vanishing under erosion and timber growth. It reappears between two unnamed creeks emptying into Lake Mary. Running on south some distance, it swings southeast, only to vanish again. About five miles on, below Newman Canyon, it shows up once more.

Climbing onto the mountain and over, Strom and La Salla followed the trail to the old military road running between Fort Apache and Camp Verde. Their theory was that the silver was known and worked long before Taylor and Roberts found it. Perhaps even the Spaniards were its first discoverers.

These two prospectors spent the winter on the mountain's south slopes where the snow did not stay long. Then Strom returned to Flagstaff alone in April, 1893, a badly shaken man. He brought in four panniers filled with silver ore, and put his and La Salla's stock in Babbitt Brothers' livery barn, run by George Peterson.

His story was that they found a ledge of silver-bearing rock where it apexed. Being low grade, they followed down it making test holes. Finally, according to Strom's account, they began a fifty-foot shaft to reach the silver-filled body. Being in solid rock no timbering was required.

On hitting the lode they extracted almost pure silver. Each took a turn below while the other manned a crude windlass. La Salla was down one morning when Strom drew up a bucket of ore. He turned away to dump it in the pile close to the shaft. Suddenly he was knocked off his feet, and a roaring and crackling filled the air. The earth shook so badly he could not stand, and through the din he heard a grinding of stone strata.

At last when he could stand and the earth tremors had lessened, he discovered the windlass was gone and the shaft had been completely filled by the earth slide. La Salla had undoubtedly been killed instantly under the hellish mass.

After shipping the silver to a mill in Denver, Strom hung around waiting for the check. Most of the time he stayed drunk in J. J. Donohue's Mineral Belt saloon. The tragedy of losing his partner seemed to hit him hardest while in his cups. He would moan and state over and over, "There's only death down there on that damned mountain of silver!"

Finally when Strom's money came, he sobered up. He still stood by his resolve to have nothing more to do with Mormon Mountain's silver. Then he said, "But I will dig Mike out of that hole and put him away properly." Strom left Flagstaff never to be seen again.

IKE SMITH was a jackass prospector. That fall he decided to follow Strom's fading sign to Mormon Mountain. Loading his two burros with tools and grub he passed down the old trail and onto the mountain. On a southwest point he found a ledge along which float was strewn. Working from there he searched diligently for the filled shaft which Strom and La Salla reportedly put down.

Failing in this quest, Smith poked about the extreme south part of the mountain. In a narrow defile he came abruptly onto the open mouth of a dark, fearsome tunnel recently worked. On the ground outside and leading in were the gnawed bones of a man and torn scraps of rotted clothing. Twenty feet inside the tunnel a mass of broken rock blocked further passage. It was obviously a cave-in. Next to this mass lay the whitening skull of a man who had been shot in the back of the head. Smith buried the bones in a shallow hole in the canyon.

On returning to Flagstaff that fall, having found no silver, he stated a belief that the slain man had been Strom. He brought out four curiously figured bronze shirt buttons. Strom had been wearing ones very much like them. Smith also figured that Strom had lied about putting down a shaft, but did so in order to protect their find. Instead, the partners had drilled a tunnel into the solid rock wall. La Salla lay under the slide that had collapsed the head. Strom had gone back, was murdered by another prospector and his stock and equipment taken away.

A. L. (Al) Sims, a big, genial, handsome man who had many friends, built a cabin on the low rim overlooking the emergence of Walnut Canyon an eighth-mile below present lower Lake Mary dam. In 1899 he preempted a 160-acre homestead, but never proved up on it.

Unfortunate circumstances began to embroil Sims thick and fast. It started one day while walking down the old trail. He wandered off under the mesa point. In a grassy glade he came onto a stark scene out of the past. Chalk-white bones on the ground and pieces of strong rope still adhering to trees showed where a horse and four mules had been tied. Something had happened to their owner and the animals had starved. Wood of the saddles, scraps of black hard leather, and rusted metal rings and buckles lay around in the grass and weeds.

Near where the mules died Sims investigated curious heaps of black rocks, some larger than his fist. He carried a number to his cabin. A little later a prospector friend told him the rocks were silver. Elated, Sims returned and gathered up all he could find. After shipping the samples to a mill, he revealed his discovery.

Excitement struck Flagstaff. People rushed to the scene in hordes. Similar rocks were found readily in masses of dead vegetation or under a thin cover of dirt. For many years afterwards the finders kept these souvenirs for display or as doorstops.

The ore Sims shipped ran 1,200 ounces to the ton, but he didn't discover that much. Malicious individuals skulked on his trail. They were convinced he had found some definite clue to the whereabouts of the silver mine — perhaps a map in a tin can that escaped destruction during the many years since the stock starved to death.

But Sims did not know any more about the silver mountain than those who were watching him. Finally the eager hopefuls came to believe that Sims had a streak of cussedness, refusing to go to the mine. Angry and resentful men fired at him several times during the summer of 1900.

Defending himself one night in a saloon from a gun-wielding, drunken attacker, Sims killed the man with a knife. He was tried on a murder charge in 1902. When the jury found him not guilty, Sims quit the country.

AMONG those known to have actively hunted the lost silver for years was Walter Durham, who ran cattle in the area; Hiram Stone, John Clark, and E. S. Carlos. All of them put down shafts or drilled tunnels somewhere on the mountain. They had silver-bearing ore laying around in their camps but it had been picked up away from their diggings.

A mystery prospector was believed to have hunted the silver before 1885 and definitely spent three decades searching. He was John Pouchie, called "Poochey" because few men could pronounce his name correctly. A secretive Frenchman, he appeared in Flagstaff always with his clothing tattered and encrusted with the kind of dirt associated with working underground. After buying supplies, he would immediately disappear into the heavy forest surrounding Mormon Mountain. His exact destination was never discovered. Men followed him but he always shook them from his trail.

Poochey definitely found silver ore, but whether or not he took it out in paying quantity was not known. The Marshalls discovered he had some. In July of 1900 they found him unconscious on the trail off the mountain. Gathering up his equipment which lay scattered around a dry camp, they loaded him onto his burro and took him to Dr. E. S. Miller in town.

Among his battered and almost worthless possessions were a dozen flat hunks of silver ore. Charley Marshall described it as being deep blue, almost black in color, and with a greenish tinge. The breaks were sharp and rough-edged, having been broken from larger slabs.

As soon as Poochey recovered, he packed grub on the burro and returned to his secret haunts.

The Marshalls made their final search for the lost silver in 1915, 1916 and 1917. During those years they used the ancient trail as a base. Charley alone picked up a total of six large chunks. Each was found separately beside the old trail markings. He believed that they had been lost from mule packs while being taken off the mountain. But no evidence came to light as to who might have been transporting them.

Poochey quit coming to Flagstaff for grub. Too many men tried following him to his lair. His food purchases thereafter were made below the Mogollon Rim at Camp Verde. For the decades he prospected, his grubstake source remained a puzzle—unless the story was true that he took several burro-loads of rich ore to the Jerome copper mine and sold it. Poochey must have been gone a long time before curious Camp Verde people began wondering why he no longer came around.

Carlos, a Flagstaff Spaniard, began hunting the lost silver soon after 1900. He, too, was a mystery man. Listening to others spouting off about the lost mine, he never made a comment of his own.

Carlos always came off Mormon Mountain about snow-fly time. In 1904 he brought a skull to Flagstaff into which a miner's pick had been driven. Indeed, when he found it, the rusted pick, wooden handle rotted out, remained in the skull. Because of curiously jutting upper front teeth and a sharply sloped forehead, the skull was believed to be that of Poochey. Whoever the dead man was, he had probably been slain in connection with the lost silver.

Carlos spent several summers driving a tunnel under a great ledge near where the skull was found. He was still at it, or at least hunting, according to the August 28, 1908, issue of the local weekly newspaper, the Coconino Sun:

> E. S. Carlos has been hunting for a lost silver mine in the vicinity of Mormon Mountain the past ten days. For a good many years a story has been in circulation to the effect that a rich silver mine was discovered there by early settlers, but owing to unsettled conditions of the country and inability to handle the ore at that time, it was covered up and left.
> Rich specimens running $800 to the ton have been found, or claimed to have been found in that section of the country, but so far no one has been able to locate mineral rich enough to support the theory that a mine really exists in that vicinity.

AFTER the appearance of this news item, Carlos faded from the picture. In 1910 Stone created the last excitement in Flagstaff about whether the mine had been found. Obtaining blank legal forms from the county recorder, he consulted an attorney on mining laws. To both he stated positively that he had found the long lost silver. He exhibited a report from the High Grade Assayers, Clarkdale, to prove it. According to this slip of paper the silver ran 1,400 ounces to the ton, a very rich find indeed.

The recorder and attorney did not reveal their information until Stone left town, ostensibly to post claim notices.

Within hours the road to Mormon Lake and the mountain thronged with excited men. It turned into the only real mineral stampede Flagstaff ever had. Not even the mercury stampede to the Painted Desert above Cameron in 1931 equaled it. Out there truckloads of amateur, get-rich-quick prospectors staked a million acres the first twenty-four hours.

Riders, pack outfits, buckboards, wagons and even a few automobiles hauled the Flagstaff stampeders to Mormon Mountain. But gradually as the weeks passed, the weary, deflated hopefuls slipped back into town.

None of them ran across Stone. He was not seen on Mormon Mountain, or anywhere else—ever. Like a good many others he did not return to file a claim on the lost mine.

The story of Mormon Mountain's silver has received the least circulation of any "lost mine." Consequently the area has never been invaded by scores of hunters from "outside." Those few locals in the know who still search, close up tighter than a bank on a holiday when asked any questions.

The old-time prospector and his crude methods of "peck and see" have been replaced by men using the latest metal detectors. They have found isolated pieces of ore, but nothing unlocking the big secret. The mountain continues to guard it well.

The few modern hunters still searching are hampered by the same questions which plagued the old-time prospector. To begin with, it is quite obvious that the scattered chunks of silver found were not all float, as the earlier hunters imagined. Since pieces were found in so many places several men must have packed ore off the mountain. The panniers were so heavily stuffed that loose pieces fell out. Of this much all are certain.

But who were they and where did they go? Those killed on and around the mountain must have been murdered by other prospectors who believed they were guarding their own wealth. No Indians lived in the vicinity and the only raiding Apaches to come near were overhauled by soldiers at the Battle of Big Dry Wash in 1882.

The old workings have filled and grown over with timber and brush. Not all can be located today. But many were dug, and if the mountain contained as much silver as Roberts said, how could all of them miss it? There is no answer to that, nor yet to where Poochey, Taylor and Roberts, Strom and La Salla, and probably Stone, got their silver. It had to come off the mountain somewhere.

Not the least of the unanswerable questions is who made the old trail? And what was it used for in the beginning? Other old trails in northern Arizona were known about—including who made them and why.

If any of these questions could be answered, claim present-day hunters, there would be no difficulty finding the lost silver. Written history is completely blank about the ancient trace over the mountain.

Ernest J. Clark writes; "In three weeks since I received my Gardiner Model 190A Metal Detector, I have found a total of approximately $685 worth of miscellaneous coins, jewelry and artifacts. Some of the coins dated back to 1802. I think the features of this metal detector are really way ahead of all the other makes, especially in the fact that it will distinguish bottle caps and other worthless items."

Trouble Rode Out of Chihuahua

.30-30 through the window and asked what they wanted.

"Where is the patron (boss)?" he asked.

I didn't want them to think I was alone for the day, and if he did want to see Otis about something, I didn't want him to wait so I said, "He rode out to look at some cattle," and pointed over to the west. Otis had gone east. I told him Otis might be just a little while, or might be gone quite some time; I didn't know. He started pushing on the screen door again, and even with the dog hitting the screen every time he touched it, the Mexican kept trying to get it open. The baby was awake by this time, adding her little bit to the general confusion, and I was getting too nervous for comfort so I told him to hit the road. He just stood there, and all of them were grinning at me.

I then decided if his eyes were not so good, I would try his hearing. I threw a shell into the rifle. His smile faded, and all three backed down the steps. My heart settled to a slower pace as I saw the other four move out from the side of the house and join these three, and I hoped they were all leaving. I watched until they passed down under the fig trees by the spring and were hidden from view. Baby missed her bath that morning. She was lucky to have me check her at all—I was too intent on the outside of the house for the next several hours.

ALONG ABOUT 12 or 1 o'clock, I ran out of cool water. In those days—on the ranches, at least—if you wanted a cool drink, you took Mother Nature's way of providing it from a cold spring and packed it to the house in buckets. I took the water bucket, called the dog, unlatched the screen door, and went down the steps. I couldn't see any saddle horses in the corral so I was sure they had gone. I was about halfway to the corral and spring when I saw a pair of legs coming down out of a big fig tree.

I stopped, and Gompers' hackles were standing straight up. The dog had stopped directly in front of me. His growls, warning me to get for the house, were wholly unnecessary. As I whirled around, I couldn't miss seeing at least four more pairs of legs coming down. I have never figured to this day why I set my little bucket down, but I made a record sprint back to those safe, thick walls. As Gompers and I reached the porch and I was relocking the screen, I located their saddle horses. The Mexicans had moved them into a big rock corral we used for branding. It was horse high and all I could see were the big flat horns on their saddles as the horses moved around. Then I knew they had planned something.

My clothesline was on the north side of the house and away from the corrals and Mexico. Otis had told me if there was ever anything wrong at the house to hang a sheet or tablecloth on this clothesline. From some directions, it could be seen for miles. I did this now, then eased the door closed and took a seat by the east window to watch for him. Soon I saw the dust on the trail to Conejo; Otis was coming in a high lope for home. Before long, I saw the dust suddenly slacken—he had seen my table cloth and pulled his horse in. He circled and came in behind the house from the north instead of from the east.

When I explained that Mexicans had been there all day and had moved their horses into the rock corral so he wouldn't see them, he told me to stay in the house and keep the doors locked. He took his rifle off the saddle, got extra shells from the shelf in the kitchen, and stepped out on the front porch. All was quiet; Gompers was asleep in the sun, but as Otis walked to the other end of the porch to see better, I listened for the crack of rifles. I just knew they would shoot him down as soon as they saw him there.

EVERYTHING was too quiet — they were gone. Otis came rushing back into the house and told me to take the baby and sleep in the attic if he wasn't back by bedtime, and to pull the ladder up after me. The "door" in the ceiling was a small hole maybe 16" x 16", and it was dark and hot up there. But it was a little hotter down below with him gone, so I just took my little peck on the cheek as I asked where he was going.

"Those damned thieves are gone, and they've got my saddle horses. I'm going after them."

I begged him to get help from headquarters. Old man Will Drace was foreman at Alamo Hueco at the time and a better man never hit the saddle, but Otis said there wasn't time to get help. I didn't think either that the Mexicans could have gone far since the last time I had seen them in the corral.

It was getting late, and I was scared. I had never spent a night alone there so near the border, but I knew how Otis felt. Most of his saddle horses he had raised himself and sold to the U-Bars. His pet rope horse, Bullet, was in that bunch in the pasture which the Mexicans had to go through to get back to Mexico. People had lost horses to the red flaggers before, and even though they recovered most of them, the animals were never very good if the Mexicans were allowed to keep them any length of time. They usually rode them to death.

When the sound of Otis' loping horse faded into silence (and that is silence when you are alone with a little baby and your husband is leaving on a tired horse ridden all day, to be ridden no telling how much longer), I just gathered up diapers and flashlight, and hit the ladder for the attic. I don't know if it was good dark outside, but it sure was inside. It's a lucky thing I had always been a good climber or I'd never have made it that night. It's a mite different, though, with a wriggling baby under one arm and a bundle of clothes in the other. There was already bottled water, canned food, and a bedroll up there for me. As I slid the .30-30 up to the loft, I just hoped I'd never have to use the thing—I hoped also that this little move would be only for one night.

ABOUT 3 a.m. Gompers let me know someone was coming. I'll never, if I live to be a hundred (and I don't have too much hope on that, either), forget how my heart was pumping as I felt around in the dark for that darned .30-30. Just as I found it and froze to listen, I could hear quick footsteps, and as Gompers had quit barking I was pretty sure it was Otis. But I didn't make a sound or move until he hit the door and called my name to let me know it was the "right guy." Boy! did I tumble out of that attic! I was tempted not to wait for the ladder.

Otis was almost asleep before he got settled in bed so about all I got in answer to my question of "Did you find them?" was a grunt of satisfaction. He was never strong on details and when he finally said he got back all of the horses except one and that he took them while the Mexicans were asleep, I didn't ask if the sleep was permanent or just for the night.

Though my husband was a fair shot, seven Mexicans were pretty high odds, so I decided he probably did slip up on them and steal his horses back—eight out of nine. The one he missed was not Bullet, or Otis probably would have still been hunting those Mexicans a month later.

Each summer for three years straight, our friend, Lola Bentley (now Brazzell, living in Phoenix), had spent her vacations with us. Her home was in El Paso. We were real anxious that nothing would go wrong while she was there.

One night just before dark we were sittting on the front porch when we heard an old "tin Lizzie" coming out of Mexico. We just supposed it was some of the Mexican farmers coming out to Hachita (about fifty miles north of us) for supplies. Soon we heard children laughing and talking, so we knew they had camped near the spring for the night.

We had planned to go to Hachita also and the next morning were almost ready to leave when one of the men came to the house and asked Otis if he would help them get their car started. Otis went down and soon had the old car purring again. We were peeved at the delay; our car was also an old Model T, and we were anxious to get started. We would have been more than peeved as we drove away and left them, still stalling around the car, just waiting for us to get out of sight, had we known what they were really after. We didn't get back home until the next day late in the afternoon. When we walked into the house, we knew the people in the car had paid us back for Otis' help in fixing their car by "cleaning house."

They took everything they could pile on the old car, and didn't miss Otis' saddle, bridle, chaps, and spurs hanging on the fence at the corral. In fact, they even took from Lola's suitcase some fancy silk shirts which she was planning to dazzle the cowboys with when they took her horseback riding. She was really furious as they had never been worn. I was moaning over my missing fig preserves and a nice new handmade quilt. Of course, Otis was lost without his saddle and other rigging, and the dog Gompers couldn't be found. We knew he was dead or they would never have gotten into the house.

It was almost a week later, after we had looked everyplace for him, that Otis found his body. They had taken the dead dog with them and dumped him out after shooting him three times (at the house, we are sure, since we found blood beside the front steps).

Otis knew a Mexican slightly who had worked on the Alamo Hueco cutting hay for a few days a couple of years before. He lived near the line, so Otis sent him word as to what had happened, thinking this Mexican had probably put the others up to stealing from us in the first place. He told the Mexican there would be no more odd jobs for him on this side of the line unless every article was returned before the month was out. He should have put a week's time limit on it.

Before the month was out, the Mexican brought most of the things to us, but Lola's bright silk shirts were now black ones. The man said one of the Mexicans was wearing the striped shirt, and he had had a hard time getting it back. Actually his effort was wasted as the shirt just made a little bigger blaze when we burned my pretty quilt, too. It was slick and filthy. Otis' saddle, bridle, and things taken from the corral were about all that were still usable. The Mexican swore to high heaven he had nothing to do with the deal and said he had told the culprits that they had better never come out of Mexico by way of Ojo Perro again or the gringos would kill them.

Every time I missed old Gompers (and that was plenty), there was one gringo, you can be sure, who was sorely tempted, but we never saw any of that particular bunch again.

Soon we moved from the Dog Springs line camp to headquarters at Alamo Hueco where my husband was made foreman with as nice a bunch of cowboys as you will ever meet—Jack Missal, Lee Pruitt, Jack Hardin, Gentry (Slick) Rutherford, and later Alex Alexander and Ed Rozell, with Ralph Gatlin dropping by and filling in when needed. We also had a young kid, my sister's brother-in-law, Weldon Lynch, to jingle horses, milk, and see that the woodboxes were full. He also helped with the cattle and fences, as he was real anxious to make a cowhand.

I wonder where all the old waddies are today? That's been a few miles back down the road, and some, I've heard, are no longer swinging ropes or checking strays. The gate is getting closer to all of us from those days and times. But me, I'm going to dodge it as long as I'm able to stay on the sunny side of the mountain. I still can and do jump when I hear a rattlesnake, but I'm no longer afraid of the Mexicans—I don't live near Chihuahua anymore.

"The Forgotten Ones"

I belong to a newly organized group in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. Five other ladies and I would like the assistance of anyone who would be interested in helping us canvass old forgotten cemeteries. We took this on as a project to help people locate their dead ancestors' graves. Most generally, the old forgotten ones have no records. If any of you would be interested, you might take this on as doing a good deed. We would give you credit and also send a copy to your state historical library. The directions of how we do this are very simple. We give the location of the cemetery, and we usually do it in sections and rows. We number them so that when people are searching, the graves are more easily found. A lot of old tombstones are covered with moss so be sure you take something along to wipe them off. And wear boots or shoes. as the grass will be growing high and you might step on something. Take a tablet and be sure to print each name and write the dates correctly. If part of the name is gone, write what is there. If a stone is broken, put that down also. I know we can depend on your doing a good job. When you have completed the cemetery, send it to me and I will type up the information and send one copy with your name and address on it to your state historical society. I am sure you will get some reward for this—perhaps not material, but a sort of spiritual feeling inside you for thinking of the dead, someone long forgotten. If you would like to do this, and when you have completed your list, send it to "Project Cemetery,"—Mrs. Gerald Followwill, 125 S. E. 57th, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma 73129

Phillips

We would like to hear from anyone tracing their branch of Phillips back to Tennessee. We want information on a William Phillips who was a courier in the War of 1812, and it is related that he carried the news of Congress declaring war on England in June of 1812 from Washington D. C., to New Orleans in twenty days. I was born in Slaton, Texas, 1923. My father, Carroll Phillips, was born in pioneer (Eastland County) Texas, June 1885. His father was born in Collinsville, Alabama, May 1863.—Carroll Phillips, Jr., Box 545, Fairbanks, Alaska 99701.

Waggs

I would like to contact anyone named Waggs, Wagy, Wagie, Waggis or Wagge. Please include all known direct ancestors and birth and death dates of same.—Mrs. William E. Hill, Route 2, Osawatomie, Kansas 66064.

Lee Akin

I have a .44 caliber percussion revolver made by E. Remington and Sons, at Ilion, New York. This revolver was obtained in Rockford, Illinois. In front of the cylinder on both sides and on the butt plate the name, Lee Akin, is stamped. I would appreciate receiving any information on this name.—Gene M. Bullington, P. O. Box 892, North Hollywood, California 91601.

McCormick

I would like information about Charlie McCormick, my brother-in-law from whom I have not heard in forty years. The last time I heard of him he was in Oklahoma, but seeing that he originated from Texas, I feel he may have returned there.—Mrs. Mary McCormick, 738 E. 77th Street, Los Angeles, California

Dart

I need information about my great-grandfather, George Dart. He was born in or around Augusta, Maine and married Lettia (Tish) Carr in Missouri in 1878 or 1879. At the time of their separation they had one son, Thomas Spencer Dart, born June 27, 1880 and were expecting another child who was my grandfather, Frank Robert Dart, born June 10, 1883 in Alma, Arkansas, where my great-grandma Carr's parents lived. She later married a Roberson.—Clay Dart, Box 475, Center Point, Texas 78010.

Walker

I would like to get in touch with Robert Lee Walker, any of his descendents, or acquaintances. He is, or was, my great-uncle, brother to my grandfather, Marion Avant Walker, and son of John David Walker and Ru Emma Avent. Robert Lee Walker was born before 1894 in New Mexico or Texas and left his parents' home (ranch) located out of Capitan, New Mexico about 1923-24 and has never been heard of since. I understand he was handy in making things grow as the family orchard and garden flourished under his "green thumb."—Mrs. Charlene Walker Fraser, Hoodcourse Acres Mobile Estates, Wemme, Oregon 97067.

Gray-Lloyd

I need information about John Gray, born 1780. He was known to be an Indian fighter. He and three of his children died with malaria within twenty-one days and were buried in Attica, Indiana. His widow and son, James Gray, born 1804, moved to Darke County, Ohio. Also, Margaret Darby, born 1815, Delaware State, married James Gray, January 1, 1832. Also, Lavina Barbara Lloyd, wife of Silas R. Hiatt, of Delaware County, Indiana. Was told she made a wagontrain trip to Iowa. Any information of the following families: Dillon, White, Barber and Rebeccah (Stokes, Strope, or Stokely) would be appreciated. But Buck has to kill Cal Bain. So he rides away toward the Rio Grande—to find refuge in that wild borderland country that is still untamed.

CAPTIVES OF THE DESERT. "Man, you're crazy . . . ridin' after them thievin' varmints without a gun," High-Lo told John Curry. His words died on his lips.
